And in this the Jews were so careful, that when there was such increase of the Levites that their cities could not contain them, they repeated the gift given them at first; for Joshua gave them only forty-eight; but before the captivity of Babylon they had twenty more added to them, as appears from 1 Chron. vi. 65, 66, &c., where, after the mention of the old number, there is an account given of twenty more added to them out of several tribes: for though they could not enlarge the bounds prescribed to them, when they were Levites, yet, as the number of Levites increased, they might give them new cities. And so they did, that they might not be straitened in their dwellings among them.

Ver. 20. Shall enlarge thy border.] That is, when he had brought them out of this wilderness, where they were encamped round about the tabernacle, into a spacious country, where they might live far distant from it.

As he hath promised thee.] Which he promised to enlarge, even as far as Ephraim, if they were obedient to him (Gen. xv. 18).

I will eat flesh.] Have a desire to eat it.

Because thy soul longeth.] There were several sorts of flesh that were lawful to be eaten, which they could not have in the wilderness, and therefore might he supposed to desire them very much when they came into Canaan, which abounded with them. And besides, they would have more plenty of such cattle as they now had, which might incline them to keep greater tables.

Thou mayest eat flesh.] This was said before, ver. 15, and was repeated with all the rest that belongs to this matter, to let them see God did not intend to abridge them too much of their liberty: for though they might not eat the tithes of their corn, wine, and oil, (and the rest mentioned ver. 17,) at their own home, because they were holy things, and therefore to be eaten in one certain place, where God's sanctuary was, yet all sorts of flesh, used at their private tables, he now gives them leave to kill anywhere, without bringing it to the tabernacle, and offering the blood at the altar, as they were tied to do while they were in the wilderness (Lev. xvii. 3, 4, &c.). For then the tabernacle was very near to every one of them; but when their border was enlarged, it must CHAPTER XII.

21 If the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to put his name there be too far from thee, then thou shalt kill of thy herd and of thy flock, which the Lord hath given thee, as I have commanded thee, and thou shalt eat in thy gates whatsoever thou soul lusteth after.

22 Even as the roebuck and the hart is eaten, so thou shalt eat them: the unclean and the clean shall eat of them alike.

23 Only be sure that thou eat not the blood: for the blood is the life; and thou mayest not eat the life with the flesh.

21 Thou shalt not eat it; thou shalt pour it upon the earth as water.

25 Thou shalt not eat it; that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, when thou shalt do that which is right in the sight of the Lord.

26 Only thy holy things which thou hast, and thy vows, thou shalt take, and go unto the place which the Lord shall choose:

27 And thou shalt offer thy burnt offerings, the flesh and the blood, upon the altar of the Lord thy God: and the blood of thy sacrifices shall be poured out upon the altar of the Lord thy God, and thou shalt eat the flesh.

28 Observe and hear all these words which I commanded thee, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever, when thou dost that which is good and right in the sight of the Lord thy God.

29 ¶ When the Lord thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their land;

30 Take heed to thyself that thou be not needs be at so great a distance from some of them, that it would have been too heavy a burden to oblige them to kill every thing they ate at the tabernacle, and therefore he dispenses with it.

Ver. 21. If the place, &c. The particle chi may better be translated here because; which makes these words a reason of the allowance given in the foregoing verse, "Because the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to put his name there, is too far from thee, thou mayest kill, &c.

Of thy herd] Such creatures as are now allowed for sacrifice, oxen, sheep, lambs, and goats.

Which the Lord hath given thee.] For food as well as other uses.

As I have commanded thee.] Given thee leave to eat at home, without carrying them to the tabernacle: so it follows, "And thou shalt eat in thy gates whatsoever thou soul lusteth after," i.e. all manner of things, of which there was great variety, not prohibited by this law.

Ver. 22. Even as the roebuck and the hart is eaten.] Which were creatures not allowed to be offered to God in sacrifice (see ver. 15), and therefore they might less doubt to eat of them, than of such as were peculiarly appointed for that use. From which this implies their thought, that out of reverence to God they should abstain; but are here satisfied they might as freely eat of them as of the other.

The unclean and the clean shall eat of them alike.] Whereas, while they were in the wilderness, only such as were clean might eat flesh, because it was sanctified by being killed at the altar; now all are indulged the same liberty, whether "they were removed from holy things (as the Jerusalem Targum expresses it), or were pure to use them, both might eat flesh alike."

Ver. 23. Eat not the blood.] Take great care, as the word signifies in the Hebrew (which is, be strong), use thy utmost diligence to prevent this.

Ver. 24. Be holy to the Lord.] See what I have noted upon Gen. ix. 1. Lev. xvii. 11, 14.

Ver. 21.] Since they could not pour it out at the altar, where nobody could meddle with it, they were to pour it out on the earth, that it might sink into it: Or, as the law required in Leviticus (xvii. 13), cover it with dust, that the cattle might not lick it up; or, the meaning may be, pour it as a common thing (which water is), without any religious rite used about it.

Ver. 25. Thou shalt not eat it.] This is repeated here so often, as it is also in Lev. xix., to show the weightiness of this command.

Ver. 26.] Only thy holy things which thou hast, and thy vows, thou shalt take, and go unto the place which the Lord shall choose:

Ver. 27.] And thou shalt offer thy burnt offerings, the flesh and the blood, upon the altar of the Lord thy God: and the blood of thy sacrifices shall be poured out upon the altar of the Lord thy God, and thou shalt eat the flesh.

Ver. 28.] Observe and hear all these words which I commanded thee, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee for ever, when thou dost that which is good and right in the sight of the Lord thy God.

Ver. 29.] ¶ When the Lord thy God shall cut off the nations from before thee, whither thou goest to possess them, and thou succeedest them, and dwellest in their land;

Ver. 30.] Take heed to thyself that thou be not snares by following them, after that they be destroyed from before thee; and that thou inquire not after their gods, saying, How did these nations serve their gods? even so will I do likewise.

31 Thou shalt not do unto the Lord thy God: for every abomination to the Lord, which he hateth, have they done unto their gods; for even their sons and their daughters they have burnt in the fire to their gods.

32 What thing soever I command you, observe to do it: thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.

Nor endeavour to know the manner of their worship. Which was very different, as Maimonides observes, according as their gods differed one from another; for that sort of worship which was acceptable to one god, might not be given to another. As they uncovered themselves (if we may believe him) before Baal-Peor, and threw a stone to Mercury. See his tract concerning the worship of the Planets, cap. 3, sect. 2, &c. and Dionys. Vossius' annotations there; where he resolves, that, if they uncovered themselves to Mercury, or threw a stone to Baal-Peor, it was not idolatry, because not their proper worship: which is a foolish opinion; for they were not to use any of their religious rites, no more than to offer sacrifice, burn incense, or bow down to any of their idols, which he acknowledged was idolatry. In short, if they gave the idol the worship proper to him, or that worship which was proper to the true God, he acknowledges they were guilty.

Even so will I do likewise.] Though men only resolve to do it, yet they were guilty of committing this sin. The Jews, indeed, make no great account of sins committed in the heart, yet in this case they are very strict, having framed this maxim, as R. Levi Barzelonita observes, Precept. ccxxvi. which their rabbins industriously inculcate into their scholars, that “the blessed God imputes no thought of any transgression to an Israelite, as if it were the fact itself, except only the thought of idolatry, which is imputed to a man as if he had committed idolatry.” Now it was a reasonable presumption, that he who inquired how the people of Canaan worshipped their gods, intended at least to worship the God of Israel, as many of those idolatrous nations, or cities, of those countries, and even the Greeks themselves, as Joh. Genusis hath demonstrated, lib. 4. De Victima Humannis, par. i. cap. 11. and par. ii. cap. 6.

Ver. 32. Observe to do it.] Keep close to the precepts I have given you about my worship, ver. 28, and see iv. 2.

Thou shalt not add thereto, nor diminish from it.] They were not to add to any other rites of worship of their own devising; or, as the ancient custom of those countries, nor omit any of those which God had commanded them to use: for if they had used any of the gentle ceremonies, whereby they honoured their gods, it would easily have introduced the worship of the gods themselves; and if they had omitted any of the rites which God had ordained, some other would have easily stepped into their room which were used by idolaters.

Maimonides, from these words, labours to prove the “eternity of the law of Moses.” But it is very strange that so great a man should be so blind as not to see what some of his brethren could discern, that God did not bind up himself neither to change nor alter these laws, though he did not permit the Israelites to do it. So the author of Sepher Ikkarim wisely glosses upon these words (lib. iii. cap. 11): “The Scripture prohibits us to add unto, or detraet from, these precepts, according to our will and pleasure; but what hinders the blessed God either to add or detract, when his blessed wisdom shall think fit? Which he illustrates in the foregoing chapter, by this example among others: A physician prescribes a diet to his patient, for such a time as he judges convenient, which he doth not declare to the sick man. Now when the time comes that the physician hath obtained his end, he changes the diet, and permits his patient what he formerly forbade, and prohibits that which he formerly permitted, Which exactly agrees to what our blessed Saviour had done.”
CHAPTER XIII.

1. If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder.

2. And the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereby he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them;

3. Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams; for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul.

CHAP. XIII.

Ver. 1. If there arise among you] In future times, a prophet.] One that pretends to have a message from God delivered to him in a vision, or by the word of the Lord: for there was a constant succession of prophets (to whom God revealed his mind several ways) among the Jews, to preserve them in the true worship of God, and instruct them in their law, and admonish them on some occasion of things to come; which was the more necessary, because there were such kinds of persons among the gentiles. Or a dreamer of dreams.] Who pretended God had appeared to him in a dream, (as he did unto Jacob, Gen. xxviii. 11.) and revealed his mind to him. Such there were in Jeremiah's time (Jer. xxix. 8).

Giveth thee a sign] Foretelleth something. Or a wonder.] By what follows one would think this belongs to the foregoing words, which are to be understood as if he had said, "If he foretold some wonderful thing," which shall shortly come to pass. Or, it may be interpreted, "shall work a miracle;" unto which the heathen did not so much pretend, as they did to predictions, which were common among them.

Ver. 2. And the sign or the wonder come to pass.] The event confirms the prediction; so that he seems a true prophet.

Saying, Let us go after other gods.] And, consequently, he persuade you to worship other gods, which he pretends is demonstrable to be lawful, by the fulfilling of his sign and wonder.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer.] Notwithstanding, look upon him as a liar, and not as a true prophet: for God cannot contradict himself, nor do any thing to persuade men to forsake him, and give his worship to another. This shows that he still pursues his intention (in this chapter, as well as all the foregoing), to establish them in the belief and worship of one God, according to the first commandment, from which nothing was more likely to seduce them, than false prophets, who were the great instruments of establishing the foulest idolatry in Israel, as appears from 1 Kings xviii. 19, where we read of no less than four hundred prophets of Baal, and four hundred and fifty prophets of the groves, that is, of other false gods, particularly Asitarne, as Mr. Selden conjectures, in his Syntagma ii. De Dis Syris, cap. 2. And there could not be a greater demonstration that a man was a false prophet, than if he endeavored to draw them to the worship of other gods, or if he pretended to speak in the name of any other God (Deut. xviii. 20), or if he commanded them to offer such sacrifices as God abhorred. Thus Aristander (as David Chytreaus notes) discovered himself to be a false prophet, though he foretold the destruction of Babylon; for he required human sacrifices to be offered: as Tiresias also predicted victory to the Thebans, provided Creon's son was offered up in sacrifice: and Chaleas at the time of the siege of Troy, but together therewith commanded the sacrifice of Iphigenia. These, and such-like things, plainly discovered they were not inspired by God, who is the lover of mankind, and cannot delight in their blood.

For the Lord your God proveth you.] That there might be an open and public discovery made, whether they sincerely loved God or not, or were steadfast in their religion. So Maimonides in his More Nechomim, par. ii. cap. 21, "God would make known to the nations of the world the measure of your faith, in the truth of this law, and of the approbation whereby you apprehend it," &c. For it had been a great weakness to suffer even a miracle to shake their faith, after it had been confirmed by so many miracles.

Ver. 4. Ye shall walk after the Lord your God.] Follow the will of God (as Maimonides interprets), declared by himself (More Nechomim, par. i. cap. 38.), which is a plainer and more genuine interpretation than that of the Gemara of Soto, cap. i. seet. 52, where R. Chama expounds it of imitating God, in clothing the naked, visiting the sick, burying the dead, &c. for "beneficence is the beginning and the end of the Divine law." Which is a pieces sense, but not here intended,

For him.] Worship him alone, (vi. 2.) Keep his commandments.] The greatest of which is this (xi. 13).

Obey his voice.] Which you heard from Mount Sinai, saying, "Thou shalt have no other gods but me," Ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him.] Steadfastly adhere unto his service, and not be drawn from it by any persuasion.

Ver. 5. That prophet, or that dreamer.] These two signify persons who pretend to different sorts of revelations, by vision or by dreams.

Shall be put to death.] This the Jews interpret to signify strangulation, unto which, upon good proof of the fact, he was to be sentenced by the great Sanhedrion: for that was a received maxim among them, that "a lying prophet was to be judged no where but by the counsel of seventy." (See Selden, lib. iii. De Synedriis, cap. 6. n. 1).

Because he hath spoken to turn you away from the 6 If thy brother, the son of thy mother, or thy son, or thy daughter, or the wife of thy bosom, or thy friend, which is as thine own soul, entice thee secretly, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers;

7 Namely, of the gods of the people which are round about you, nigh unto thee, or far off from thee, from the one end of the earth even unto the other end of the earth;

8 Thou shalt not consent unto him, nor hearken unto him; neither shall thine eye pity him, neither shall thou spare, neither shalt thou conceal him:

9 But thou shalt surely kill him; thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterwards the hand of all the people.

10 And thou shalt stone him with stones, that he die; because he hath sought to thrust thee away from the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage.

Lord][Persuaded you to forsake your God and his service, to whom you owe your liberty and all your possessions in the land of Canaan.

To thrust thee out of the way which the Lord thy God commanded thee to walk in.] These words express how zealous such imposters were in their importunities, and how restless in their endeavours to draw men to idolatry, pressing them so earnestly, as if they would force them to it.

So shalt thou put the evil away from the midst of thee.

I. e. The danger of idolatry; by taking away the life of him that would have seduced others unto it.

Or thy brother,] Who lay in the same womb with him.

Or thy son, or thy daughter,] Who were dearer than a brother.

Or the wife of thy bosom,] Who was still dearer, sleeping in the same bed with him, as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it.

Or thy friend, which is as thine own soul,] Whom thou lovest as thou dost thy life. He puts a friend in the chief place, (as the son of Sirach also doth, Eccles. xxxiii. 19.) which their wives, by the ill choice they made of them, had not always in their affection.

Here is no mention of father or mother, because a child, as the Hebrews fancy, was to have more reverence for them, than to accuse them of any crime whatsoever. As if a greater regard was to be had to them than to God himself. The true reason is, because there was no need to name them; for, if their piety to God was to overcome their love to all those relations before mentioned, it could not be supposed that respect to parents was to come into competition with it.

Entice thee secretly,] In the foregoing verses he speaks of an open seducer, and here of a secret one; there it was against the public authority, and here of one of the ordinary people.

Saying, Let us go and serve other gods,] The Jews think this is meant of one who invited others to idolatry, but did not press them with reasons, as in the former case. Which is not likely; for all men pretend some reason or other for such a great alteration as that to a new religion.

Which thou hast not known, thou, nor thy fathers,] This aggravates the crime; to entice them to forsake God, who was known to have done such wonders for their fathers, and was so good to them, and go to serve gods with whom they had no acquaintance.

Ver. 7. Of the gods of the people which are round about you,] Wheresoever they were (for several nations, several gods), whether in the neighbouring countries, or in remote parts; it made no difference at all, if they were strange gods.

From the one end of the earth even unto the other,] The enterit might possibly suggest the universality of the worship to which he invited him, as an argument to embrace it.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt not consent unto him,] As many words as there are in this verse, the Jews think there are so many precepts. The first of which is this, not to be led by affection and kindness to yield unto his motion. So they interpret these words, "thou shalt not love him,"

Nor hearken unto him,] I do not see how this differs from the former; but they interpret it, that "they ought to hate him," as well as his motion. So Maimonides, in his book of the Worship of the Planets (cap. 5. sect. 6, 7).

Neither shalt thine eye pity him,] This they fancy signifies, that if he were in danger of death, they should not help him, but let him perish.

Neither shalt thou spare] When he was brought before the judge, they were not to intercede for him, nor say any thing in his favour, nor assist him to defend himself.

Neither shalt thou conceal him,] Dispose any thing that might make against him. And, no doubt, God intended by all these words to signify, that he ought to be looked upon as his greatest enemy; upon whom therefore they were to have no mercy, but to prosecute him unto death, as guilty of the highest treason against the Divine Majesty.

Ver. 9. But thou shalt surely kill him,] Not privately, as he enticed others, but by a legal process against him in a court of judgment. And that not the highest, but in the court of twenty-three, who might proceed against him, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. iii. De Syedr. cap. 4. The only difficulty was, how to prove him guilty who enticed another secretly (as the text saith), and not before witnesses. To which the Jews answer. That he who was enticed was to dispose some persons as secretly near to the place of their next meeting, who might hear all he said, and testify it in court.

Thine hand shall be first upon him to put him to death,] That he might be first stoned to death, and the accuser was to throw the first stone at him, together with the witnesses (xvii. 7). For it would have weakened the credit of his accusation if he had not been the foremost in the execution (see xvii. 7).

Afterwards the hand of all the people,] Who were to assist in the execution of this sentence.

The first words of this verse, which we translate, "Thou shalt surely kill him," the Vulgar Latins translates, " "Thou shalt forthwith kill him." And so the Jews understand the Hebrew phrase, "Killing thou shalt kill him;" i. e. immediately have him before the court of judgment. As the LXX. understood it, ὁ παρετελεσθήσεται ἀναπάντως, i. e. "informing thou shalt inform against him," that is, without delay. And since severely the Jews add, that, after he was condemned, he was immediately also put to death. Whereas in other crimes the execution was resphed, after the sentence was pronounced, for a day and a night, that the man might have time to clear his innocence, if he were able, by any new proofs. Such severity was but needful among a people prone to idolatry, and encompassed on all sides with idolatrous nations.

Ver. 10. Thou shalt stone him with stones, that he
CHAPTER XIII.

11 And all Israel shall hear, and fear, and shall do no more any such wickedness as this is among you.

12 ¶ If thou shalt hear say in one of thy cities, which the Lord thy God hath given thee to dwell there, saying,

13 Certain men, the children of Belial, are gone out from among you, and have withdrawn the inhabitants of their city, saying, Let us go and serve other gods, which ye have not known;

14 Then shalt thou enquire, and make search, and ask diligently; and, behold, if it be truth, and the thing certain, that such abomination is wrought among you; in these two verses, and partly from the pretended tradition of their elders), whereby they mitigated the sharpness of this law. For they would not proceed upon it to destroy a city, though they found them idolaters unless the seducers were two, or more; and these also men, not women; because the law here speaks in the plural number, of certain men, children of Belial. As if their forsaking God was not a crime, whether they were persuaded to it or not by others. They say, also, it was not to be a mere town, or village. but a city; because the words here are in one of thy cities, in which there were more than a hundred houses: if there were fewer, it was no city in their account, and so escaped. They who seduced a city also were to be of the same city; because it is said there. These men of Belial are gone out from among you, All which are more quirks, which have no solid reason in them. They are all mentioned together in the title Sanhedrin, set forth by J. Coch, cap. 11, sect. 4. and by Maimonides more largely, in his Avoda Zara, and our Selden, lib. iii. De Syned. cap. 5. n. 2.

But there are other temperaments of this law, which have no foundation in reason. As, first, that a city was not to be destroyed, unless the major part of the inhabitants were fallen off to serve other gods. And, secondly, that the law speaks only of lesser cities, not of those which were so large that the greatest part of a tribe lived in it; for God would not have a whole tribe cut off by the senate. Thirdly, they might not destroy any of the six cities of refuge, because they were none of theirs, but God's: and the words of the law are, “In one of thy cities, which the Lord hath given thee to dwell in,” whereas these were given for a farther purpose. And, fourthly, some add, not a frontier town; because it is said, “in the midst of them” (so the words are in the Hebrew, which we translate among you), to which they subjoin a better reason, because the whole country might have been expected to be overrun by the gentiles. And, lastly, they except Jerusalem from this law, because it was God's seat; and (as Maimonides will have it) it was not distributed to any particular tribe. Which, how it is to be understood, see Selden in the place above named, sect. 3, 4, where he touches upon all these. But, if Jerusalem was to be excepted from the judgment of men, God took care to have this sentence executed upon it by his own judgment; for he sent Nebuchadnezzar against it, whose soldiers burnt with fire both the house of the Lord, and the house of the king, and all the houses of Jerusalem (Jer. lii. 13).

If it be truth,—that such abomination is wrought among you? If the inquisition found, upon due examinations, that there was a plain and evident proof of their guilt, they were to make their report to the great Sanhedrin; who, being satisfied that either the whole city, or the greater part of them, were fallen to idolatry, sent to them two men of extraordinary wisdom (who were candidates for the senatorial dignity) to admonish them, and, by arguments and per-ussions, to endeavour to reduce them to the worship of the Lord God of Israel. And if they prevailed, they were pardoned and no further proceedings against them; but if they contumaciously, then 15 Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city with the edge of the sword, destroying it utterly, and all that is therein, and the cattle thereof, with the edge of the sword.

16 And thou shalt gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street thereof, and shalt burn with fire the city, and all the spoil thereof every whit, for the Lord thy God: and it shall be an heap for ever; it shall not be built again.

17 And there shall cleave nought of the the Sanhedrin commanded the people of Israel to raise an army, and besiege the place, and enter it by force, if they could not otherwise. And when the city was taken, several courts were appointed to try and condemn all that were guilty. Thus Malinovides, in the forenamed treatise, reports the method of proceeding, out of their ancient authors (see Selden, sect. 6).

Ver. 15. Thou shalt surely smite the inhabitants of that city] The same author there saith, that, in the hearing of thecourt, every one who was found guilty of idolatry, after admonition, by two witnesses, was set aside: and if they proved to be the lesser part of the city, they were stoned (according to the law of single apostates), the rest being freed from punishment: but if they were the greater part of it, they were sent to the great Sanhedrin, who adjudged them to be cut off by the sword, together with their wives and children. And thus the whole city was to be punished if there was an universal defection.

Destroying it utterly.] In the Hebrew the word is, Thou shalt make it a cherem, or an accursed thing. And so the LXX. ἀναζημίζεις άναθημάτις, where the Vulgar translates it as we do, “Thou shalt utterly destroy it;” which is consonant to the notion of the Hebrew word (see Selden, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 7. p. 131). So that if any righteous man had any thing therein at that time, it was to be destroyed, as the very words are in the title Sanhedrin, cap. 11. sect. 5. But it is to be supposed, that all who feared God would remove their effects, together with themselves, from so wicked a place, before sentence was pronounced against them. On the contrary, they say, the goods of the idolaters, wheresoever they were found, whether within the city or without, were to be burnt.

Ver. 16. Gather all the spoil of it into the midst of the street] Into the market-place, as the Jews interpret it. Or, if it had none, they were to make a spacious place, into which all the spoil and the household stuff was to be brought, and fire set to it, to consume it, as an anaathema, or cursed thing. What temperaments, as they called them, there were to mitigate the severity of this sentence, see Mr. Selden, in the place forenamed, sect. 7.

And shall burn with fire the city.] For the vindication of God’s honour, and preserving men in their allegiance to him. R. Simeon, in the title Sanhedrin, interprets it in this manner, sect. 6. “Thus saith the Lord, If you do justice upon a city full of idolatry, cursed thing to thine hand: that the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his anger, and shew thee mercy, and have compassion upon thee, and multiply thee, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers;”

18 When thou shalt hearken to the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep all his commandments which I command thee this day, to do that which is right in the eyes of the Lord thy God.

I will account it, as if you had offered a whole burnt-offering unto me.”

It shall not be built again.] The Hebrew doctors do not entirely agree in the interpretation of these words. For some of them say (in that place of the Sanhedrin now named), that they were not so much as to make a garden or orchard in that place. Others of them say, though it might not be restored into the form of a city, yet they might employ the ground in plantations of trees. But there are those who interpret the words so rigidly, that they think it was not lawful to erect any building there, not so much as a dove-house, but it was to lie waste (see Selden, sect. 8). If any man did attempt to build such a city, he was to be beaten, as the same great man observes, lib. i. De Synedr. cap. 13. p. 558.

Ver. 17. There shall cleave nought of the cursed thing to thine hand?] They were not to take the smallest part of the spoil to their own use. “For as long as the wicked are in the world (say the Jews in the forenamed title Sanhedrin), the fierce anger of God will remain in the world; but when they are removed the wrath of God also will cease.” Now the wickedness of purloining any thing that was a cherem, as the Hebrews call it, or an accursed thing, appears in the story of Achan, who brought all Israel into danger by it, as we read in the seventh of Joshua. And Saul is an eminent example of it also, for he lost his kingdom for this sin (1 Sam. xv. 3. 9. 19. 26, &c.).

That the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his anger.] This explains, in part, what he means in the former verse, when he bids them burn the city and the spoil, “for the Lord their God;” i. e. to pacify the Divine Majesty, who was highly incensed by such a wickedness. The punishment of which was, indeed, very terrible, but very necessary; because the crime was of so high a nature, that it struck at the very foundation of their religion and government.

Shew thee mercy, and have compassion upon thee.] God promises to deal the better with them, for executing this judgment upon such dangerous offenders. Multiply thee.] They were not to fear any want of people, by cutting off such a multitude; for God promises to increase them by this loss.

Ver. 18.] It was not sufficient that they kept themselves from idolatry, unless they also executed his vengeance upon idolaters: for the inflicting the punishment before named was as right in his eyes, as the observance of any other of his precepts.
1. Ye are the children of the Lord your God: ye shall not cut yourselves, nor make any baldness between your eyes for the dead.

2. For thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God, and the Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself, above all the nations that are upon the earth.

3. Ye shall not eat any abominable thing.

4. These are the beasts which ye shall eat: the ox, the sheep, and the goat,
5 The hart, and the roebuck, and the fallow deer, and the wild goat, and the pygarg, and the wild ox, and the chamois.
6 And every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the claw into two claws, and cheweth the cud among the beasts, that ye shall eat.
7 Nevertheless these ye shall not eat of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the cloven hoof; as the camel, and the hart, and the coney: for they chew the cud, but divide not the hoof; therefore they are unclean unto you.
8 And the swine, because it divideth the hoof, yet cheweth not the cud, it is unclean unto you: ye shall not eat of their flesh, nor touch their dead carcase.
9 ¶ These ye shall eat of all that are in the waters: all that have fins and scales shall ye eat:
10 And whatsoever hath not fins and scales ye may not eat; it is unclean unto you.
11 ¶ Of all clean birds ye shall eat.
12 But these are they of which ye shall not eat:

Ver. 5. The hart, and the roebuck.] These, and the rest that follow in this verse, though they might not be offered in sacrifice, were allowed to be eaten; and seem to be mentioned as the principal food in the land of Canaan (xii. 15. 22).

Fallow deer.] It is not very material what the word ιακμορ signifies, because we are not now concerned in this law about difference of meats; therefore we may follow our translation, as well as any other; and the famous Bochartus hath made it probable, that it signifies either kind of deer or of goat (par. i. Hierozie. lib. iii. cap. 23).

Wild goat.] So the Hebrew word Ακκο signifies (which is nowhere else to be found), the same author proves in the same book, cap. 19.

Pygarg.] This is also a kind of doe or goat (as he shows, cap. 23), which the Hebrews call dixon. We find mention of pygargus in Juvenal's eleventh satire; where the old school gives this account of it: that it is a kind of deer, quadroon, it should seem, and of a white colour, whose hinder parts are white. From whence it had its name among the Greeks, who call the buttocks περγγαγιζω.

Wild ox.] So we translate the Hebrew word θερ, or θαο. But herein Bochartus dissent; because there were no such creatures in Judea (as he observes there, cap. 26), which are bred in colder countries. And therefore he reckons this also among his deer or goats (cap. 28).

Chamois.] The Hebrew word זמר Hebrew he also thinks signifies as the former, a kind of goat or hart; of which there was great variety in those countries. And this he thinks of all other was massime δετπα, "remarkable for jumping," which is the signification of the word zemera in the Arabic language (see cap. 21).

Ver. 6.] He forbears to reckon up any more particulars, and only sets down the general marks whereby they might be known; which he had delivered in Lev. xi. 3 (see there).

Ver. 7.] These exceptions from the general rule have been explained, Lev. xi. 4—6.

Ver. 8.] See upon Lev. xi. 7.

Ye shall not eat of their flesh.] See Lev. xi. 8.

Ver. 9.] See Lev. xi. 9.

Ver. 10.] See Lev. xi. 10—12.

CHAPTER XIV.

22 Thou shalt truly tithe all the increase of thy seed, that the field bringeth forth year by year.

23 And thou shalt eat before the Lord thy God, in the place which he shall choose to place his name there, the tithe of thy corn, of thy wine, and of thine oil, and the firstlings of thy herds and of thy flocks; that thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always.

gentile, who might happen then to be in their country. For there were three sorts of people called by the name of strangers, being not of the Jewish nation. First, such as had received circumcision, and consequently embraced the Jewish religion, who were called gere-teedek strangers, or proselytes of justice. Others were not circumcised, but yet worshipped the God of Israel, who were called strangers of the gate, or gere-tosha, strangers dwelling among them; because they were to abide in their country constantly. But there was a third sort, called nocherim, which we here translate aliens, who were mere gentiles, and not suffered to have a habitation among them; but only to come and go in their traffic with them.

First, that if and as God, year.

For they were his thankful experiment.

The observation of R. Bechui upon these words ("thy corn, thy wine, and thine oil") is something curious, but it hath a great deal of truth in it:—if thou pay the tithe, saith he, then it is thy corn; if thou do not, it is my corn, and not thine (in like manner, if they paid the tithe of wine and oil); for it is said in Hos. ii. 9, "Therefore I will return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof." For they forfeited the whole, who did not pay the tenth, which was the rent God reserved to himself. And the same R. Bechui represents this as a very merciful law: For it is the fashion of the world, saith he, if a man have ground of his own, to let it out to tenants at what rate he pleases, for a half or third part, to be paid to him: but it is not so with the Almighty, whose the earth is, and who raises clouds, and waters it with rain, and sends down drops of dew, and makes fat the fruits of the earth; and yet requires but one part of ten, for his own uses. This made it highly probable, that Moses should admonish the Israelites so often diligently to pay their tithe.

That thou mayest learn to fear the Lord thy God always.] This justifies what I said, that the design of this was to preserve them steadfast in their religion, by having communion with him, in so solemn a manner, every year: for that is meant by "fearing the Lord always:" continuing in the worship and service of him alone (see vi. 1).

Ver. 24.] If they lived at so great a distance from the sanctuary, or the way was so bad, that it would be very troublesome and chargeable to carry those tithes in kind, here they have a liberty granted them to make money of them, and with that to buy provision for the feast at the sanctuary, when they came thither; as it follows in the next verse. All things, likewise, which would not keep so long as till they could go to the house of God, they were to turn into money; but things that were not perishable, they were to carry in kind, if they did not dwell too far off from it.

Ver. 25. Then shalt thou turn it into money.] Adding a fifth part to it, as the law is, Lev. xxvii. 31.

And bind up the money in thine hand.] Put it into a bag by itself, and not mix it with other money, but keep it bound up till the next feast; and then carry it in thine hand, to the place where God's house was settled.
DEUTERONOMY.

26 And thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after, for oxen, or for sheep, or for wine, or for strong drink, or for whatsoever thy soul desireth: and thou shalt eat there before the Lord thy God, and thou shalt rejoice, thou, and thine household.

27 And the Levite that is within thy gates; thou shalt not forsake him; for he hath no part nor inheritance with thee.

God would not have them excused from going to that place with these things in kind upon every slight reason; and therefore made it something chargeable to exchange them into money, by requiring a fifth part of them. And besides, the elders made a constitution, that this liberty should be allowed to none, but those who lived above a day's journey from Jerusalem, which at last was the fixed place of God's worship. And, that it might be known certainly what was a day's journey, the places at that distance were fixed from every quarter; viz. Lydda on the west, the river Jordan on the east, Acrabatta on the north, and Elath on the south, as J. Wagenseil hath observed in his confutation of that blasphemous book, called Toldos Jeschua, p. 22.

Ver. 26. Thou shalt bestow that money for whatsoever thy soul lusteth after.] Purchase such provision as they most delighted in, of all meats that God's law allowed.

Thou shalt eat there.] Make a holy entertainment at the house of God.

Rejoice, thou, and thine household.] Men-servants, and maid-servants, as well as sons and daughters, (xii. 18), together with the Levites, widows, orphans, and strangers.

Ver. 27. And the Levite.] They were always to be invited to these feasts (see xii. 19).

For he hath no part nor inheritance with thee.] They being wholly devoted to the worship of God, and the study of the law, as Maimonides observes, in his More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 39 (see xii. 19).

Ver. 28. At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe.] The opinion of the Hebrew doctors is, That this was not a distinct tithe from that which they call the second tithe paid every year, but the very same, which every third year was not to be carried to the sanctuary, but to be employed to the comfort of the poor, in their own cities and houses. For thus they explain it: That in the third year after the year of release, and in the sixth year, the tithe that was wont to be carried to the place where the sanctuary was, and there spent in feasts before God, was to be spent upon the poor in every town where they that paid the tithe lived; but every first, second, fourth, and fifth year, from the year of release, it was spent in holy entertainments at the house of God. In the year of release itself (which was every seventh year), no tithes at all were paid of any kind, because all lay common. So that every year the owner of the ground set out a second tithe; but he was not bound to carry it every year to Jerusalem; for in compass of seven years, four of those years only were appointed for their journey thither, and two they stayed at home (see Seiden, of Tithes, and bib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. p. 692). But this is contradicted by other great men, particularly by Bishop Montagu, who asserts these to be two distinct tithes: see p. 332, &c. especially p. 346, and those that follow. And Josephus seems plainly to be of his mind, p. 349. Old Tobit calls it τὰρεῖτυ διατίρισμα, "the third tithe," i. 8.

The tithe of—(the same year,] i. e. Of the third year.

And shalt lay it up within thy gates:] It was not to be carried to the place where God's house was, but to be spent at home.

Ver. 29. And the Levite.] See ver. 37.

The stranger, &c.] This tithe was not spent in joy and gladness, as the second tithe was (ver. 26), when they went to God's dwelling-place, but merely in the relief and comfort of the poorer sort of people, who otherwise might have been forced to beg, or to serve strangers, and thereby in danger of being perverted from their religion.

That the Lord thy God may bless thee] This tithe, the Jews say, was called the "consummation of tithes;" because herein the love of their neighbours was most eminently apparent. For it is likely they themselves had no share in this, as they had at the feasts upon the second tithe, but was wholly spent upon the persons here named. Whose hearts could not but be moved to pray to God for his blessing upon them in all their labours, which he here promises to bestow.

CHAPTER XV.

1 The seventh year a year of release for the poor. 7 It must be no let of lending or giving. 12 An Hebrew servant, 16 except he will not depart, must in the seventh year go forth free and well furnished. 19 All firstling males of the cattle are to be sanctified unto the Lord.

1 At the end of every seven years thou shalt make a release.

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 1. At the end of every seven years] It appears, from ver. 9, that this phrase signifies as much as "every seventh year."

Thou shalt make a release.] Perfectly free their brethren from all their debts which they owed to their creditors. This year was famous not only for this, but for letting servants go free (as some think,

28 ¶ At the end of three years thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thine increase the same year, and shalt lay it up within thy gates:

29 And the Levite, (because he hath no part nor inheritance with thee,) and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, which are within thy gates, shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hand which thou doest.

2 And this is the manner of the release: Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his Exod. xxi. 9), and for letting their ground rest (Lev. xxv. 31), and for reading this law publicly to all the people (Deut. xxxi. 10).

Ver. 2. This is the manner] It is thus to be understood.

Every creditor that lendeth ought unto his neighbour shall release it.] It was an entire acquittance, not of debts contracted by sale of lands or goods, to those who were able to pay, but of money lent to a neighbour shall release it; he shall not exact it of his neighbour, or of his brother: because it is called the Lord's release.

3 Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again: but that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release;

4 Save when there shall be no poor among you; for the Lord shall greatly bless thee in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance to possess it; neighbour or friend, merely to relieve his poverty, not to carry on trade, or to make a purchase. For nothing could have been more absurd, than to have extinguished such debts, whereby the borrower was enriched.

5 Only if thou carefully hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all these commandments which I command thee this day.

He shall not exact it of his neighbour.] Here the word brother is added, to explain what is meant by a neighbour: viz, an Israelite or a proselyte entirely of their religion, who had all the privileges of an Israelite. Some think, that by not exacting money lent to such a man, is meant no more but only forbearing to demand it in this year, because there was no sowing or reaping in it; or if he did, that he should not have power to recover it by law this year, though afterward he might. But the plain meaning seems to be, that he should be perfectly free from his debt, as a servant, after six years, was from his service: though, if afterward he grew rich, in good conscience he was bound to pay it.

The Lord's release.] In the Hebrew the words schemitta tithom, signify, that this year was "a release to the Lord, or for the Lord." In honour, that is, of him, who made this a year of great charity: in obedience to whom they were bound to be very kind to their poor brethren. But the Jews fancy they were not bound to be so kind as to make this release, till the very last day of the year. So that if a man had borrowed money in the beginning of it, he was not acquitted of this debt at all till the very last day. But if a man had been binding himself the former year, he had no release of this that he should have no power to recover it by law this year; though afterward he might.

Ver. 3. Of a foreigner thou mayest exact it again.] Of an alien, as we translate the word noeri, in the foregoing chapter, ver. 91, that is, of one who was neither an Israelite, nor proselyted to their religion, but a mere gentile. The only question is, whether they were not to remit the debts of a proselyte of the gate, who, I think, is nowhere called their brother in the law; and therefore they were not obliged to discharge them from what they owed.

But that which is thine with thy brother thine hand shall release.] This seems to restrain it wholly to those who were Jews, or had all the privileges of Jews.

Ver. 4. Save when there shall be no poor among you.] Whether we follow this translation, or that in the margin of our Bibles, it appears that they were obliged to acquit only their poor brethren; of whom they were not to exact their debts, lest they should be tempted to flee to the gentiles, and forsake their religion: so this was a provision still against idolatry. Or, if we understand it as it is in the margin, "to the end that there be no poor among you," the sense is the same; that they were by this charity to keep men from extreme necessity, which might force them to go a begging, or to seek for relief in strange countries.

For the Lord shall greatly bless thee.] He would not have them think that they might become poor themselves by this means; for he assures them God would 6 For the Lord thy God shall bless thee, as he promised thee: and thou shalt lend unto many nations, but thou shalt not borrow; and thou shalt reign over many nations, but they shall not reign over thee.

7 If there be among you a poor man of one of thy brethren within any of thy gates in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not harden thine heart, nor shut thine hand from thy poor brother:

8 But thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need, in that which he wanteth.

9 Beware that there be not a thought in thy heart to say, I have made rich and the Lord hath given me: therefore I will give to the poor: for he that hath pity upon the poor lendeth unto the Lord; and that he will render to him, and will give him back again.
DEUTERONOMY.

wicked heart, saying, The seventh year, the year of release, is at hand; and thine eye be evil against thy poor brother, and thou givest him nought; and he cry unto the Lord against thee, and it be sin unto thee.

10 Thou shalt surely give him, and thine heart shall not be grieved when thou givest unto him: because that for this thing the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thy works, and in all that thou puttest thine hand unto.

11 For the poor shall never cease out of the land: therefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt open thine hand wide unto thy brother, to thy poor, and thy needy, in thy land.

12 ¶ And if thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee, and serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free from thee.

13 And when thou sendest him out free from thee, thou shalt not let him go away empty:

14 Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock, and out of thy floor, and out of thy vineyard.

rebellion or contumacy (i.e. very sorely), till he gave as much as they judged he ought to do. Unto thy brother, to thy poor, and to thy needy] Here are evidently three different sorts of persons mentioned as objects of their charity, which may be looked upon as directing the excellent order of it. For, first, they were to relieve those that were nearest to them in blood, called here their brethren. Then secondly, such as were in great misery. And, thirdly, such as were low in the world, and required some help, but not so much as the former sort. Some indeed will not admit such a difference between the words poor and needy, but think the last signifies such whose condition was calamitous; about which I think it is not worth while to dispute. I shall rather observe, that God took exceeding great care that none should come to very great want, by the large provision he made for the poorer sort of people: who had the benefit of the third tithe, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, which was wholly given to them every third year; and of the sabbatical year, when all that grew of itself was common to every body; and of this release of debts in the same year; and of the large quantity of corn, which they were bound to leave every year, in the corners of their fields, with the ears that fell, and the sheath that was left, &c.

Ver. 12. If thy brother, an Hebrew man, or an Hebrew woman, be sold unto thee] Whether sold by themselves, or by the court of judgment, for theft. But there was some difference between a man and a woman (see Exod. xxi. 2, 3, &c.). And the same law, they say, was to be observed about those who were sold by their father, or were born of Hebrew slaves.

And serve thee six years; then in the seventh year thou shalt let him go free] He doth not speak of the year of release, as if he were then to be set free, though he had served but one year, or perhaps no more than half a year before that time came, but of the seventh year from the time of his sale: for he was to serve six complete years, unless the jubilee happened to intervene, when every one was set free, though he had not served so long; but such servants as were taken in the wars, or were sold by Canaanites, or born of them, might be kept perpetual slaves, unless they were manumitted by their masters, with the loss of some member of their body.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt not let him go away empty] But bestow something upon him for his more comfortable subsistence when he was a freeman. And this comprehends women as well as men, as appears by the foregoing verse: but then it is to be understood of such as went out free by virtue of this law, after they had served six years, not of such as were redeemed by their friends, or redeemed themselves with their own money (Lev. xxv. 18). For such might he supposed not to need their masters' kindness, as they did who had nothing to help them out of their slavery.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt furnish him liberally out of thy flock] That they might put themselves in a way of press: of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee thou shalt give unto him.

13 And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt, and the Lord thy God redeemed thee: therefore I command thee this thing to day.

14 And it shall be, if he say unto thee, I will not go away from thee; because he loveth thee and thine house, because he is well with thee;

15 Then thou shalt take an awl, and thrust it through his car unto the door, and he shall be thy servant for ever. And also unto thy maid-servant thou shalt do likewise.

living well in the world: which they were not able to do without this assistance, because what they got in their six years' service was wholly for their master, and not for themselves. He doth not prescribe a certain measure to their bounty, but leaves every man to express his affection freely towards God and towards his neighbour. But the Hebrews say, they were bound to give them at least thirty shekels of silver.

Of that wherewith the Lord thy God hath blessed thee] Considering how God hath enriched thee, even by his service.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman.] A word not to bring them empty out of their slavery, but loaded with silver, and gold, and raiment (Exod. xii. 35). By which bounty of God to themselves, they might take the best measure of their duty to their poor brethren when they were dismissed from servitude.

Therefore I command thee this thing to day.] In remembrance of that great benefit, he enjoined this benevolence to poor slaves.

Ver. 16. I will not go away from thee.] Refused to enjoy his liberty, when his six years' service was expired.

Because he loveth thee and thine house.] The phrase in Exod. xxii. 5. being, "saying, shall say, I love my master," &c. Abarbenel from thence gathers, that it was necessary he should often profess how loath he was to leave his master and his family, and make repeated declarations of his affection to them.

Because he is well with thee.] Lives happily. Out of these words Maimonides infers that there was to be reciprocal love between the servant and his master, for if the servant loved his master, yet if his master did not love him, his ear was not bored: for he could not take content in his staying with him. But these words suppose his master's kindness to himself by his good usage of him.

Ver. 17. Take an awl, and thrust it through his ear.] But first he was to bring him before the judges, that he might there in open court profess the same that he had done to his master; and thereby make it appear there was no fraud or deceit in the business: and that his master did not keep him against his will contrary to this law. See Exod. xxi. 6, where all this is explained.

And also unto thy maid-servant] This relates only to the not sending maid-servants away empty; not to the boring their ears, if they had no mind to be freed; for that was not used, if we may believe the Hebrew doctors, to maid-servants. It was sufficient, if they had a mind to stay with their masters, that they addicted themselves, in solemn words, to their service for ever. But there were many differences between a man-servant and a maid-servant, at least in some cases (see upon Exod. xxi. 7), which are explained with great nicety by the Hebrew doctors: with which 18 It shall not seem hard unto thee, when thou sendest him away free from thee; for he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee, in serving thee six years: and the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all that thou dost.

19 ¶ All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify unto the Lord thy God: thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, nor shear the firstling of thy sheep.

20 Thou shalt eat it before the Lord thy God year by year in the place which the Lord shall choose, thou and thy household.

I need not trouble the reader, because there is no such slavery among us in these days.

Ver. 18. It shall not seem hard unto thee when thou sendest him away free from thee;] It is plain by this that he returns to what he was speaking of, ver. 12, 15, &c. concerning their not letting their servants go away empty when they had their freedom: for this was the chief thing that could seem hard to them.

For he hath been worth a double hired servant to thee.] Who served at most only for three years, and had wages paid him all the time (Isa. xvi. 14).

In serving thee six years:] Twice as long as a hired servant, and for nothing. So that, considering what wages he gave the others, and perhaps, they paid for him, they would find themselves gainers by such slaves, and therefore should not think much to give them a gratuity when they send them away.

The Lord thy God shall bless thee.] He encourages them to hope they should be greater gainers otherways by this charity, which would procure God's blessing upon their future labours. This argument he had pressed twice or thrice before, in this chapter, ver. 4. 6. 10.

Ver. 19. All the firstling males that come of thy herd and of thy flock thou shalt sanctify.] All the first-born males were the Lord's, by a law made at their coming out of Egypt; and he gave them to his priests for their portion (Exod. xiii. 3. 15. Numb. xvi. 15).

Thou shalt do no work with the firstling of thy bullock, &c.] Besides the firstling males, which alone were separated to the Lord, there were also firstling females; which, though they were not sanctified to him as the males were, yet were not to be employed by the owners, as the rest of their cattle, but offered as peace-offerings to God. Of which they themselves had a good share, though some part of them was given to the priests.

Ver. 20. Thou shalt eat it before the Lord.] It is evident from hence, that he speaks of such female firstlings as I mentioned in the foregoing verse; for of the males they might not eat, but they belonged entirely to the priests.

Year by year. At their solemn festivals, when they were first to offer them unto God; and then the feasts upon these peace-offerings followed.

Thou and thy household.] With the Levites and strangers, &c. whom they were to invite to these sacred entertainments: for this is but a repetition of the law twice or thrice mentioned before, xii. 6. 7, &c. 17. 18. 26. xiv. 23. and upon this occasion here again inculcated, because it was of exceeding great moment, to preserve them in the worship and service of God alone.

Ver. 21. If there be any blemish therein.] This is another reason why he mentions these feasts again, that he might admonish them what to do with their

DEUTERONOMY.

21 And if there be any blemish therein, as if it be lame, or blind, or have any ill blemish, thou shalt not sacrifice it unto the Lord thy God.

22 Thou shalt eat it within thy gates: the unblemished ones firstlings, if there were any blemish in them, which made them unfit for sacrifice. These blemishes he had spoken of in Lev. xxii. 21, 22, 24. But here adds the lame to those there named. Which the prophet Maleachi also mentions (and so do the heathens), as unmeet for God (Mal. i. 8).

23 Thou shalt not sacrifice it] No, not to make such a charitable feast at the sanctuary.

Ver. 22. Thou shalt eat it within thy gates; it was free for them to eat it at home; though it was very probable God expected they should invite the Levites and the strangers, the fatherless and the widows, to partake of it (as they did of the third tithe, xiv. 29), because, if it had been without blemish, it must have been so employed at the sanctuary.

The unclean and the clean person shall eat it]

Whereas, if it had been sacrificed at their feasts, only the clean could have eaten of it. As the roebuck, and as the hart. See xii. 15. 22.

Ver. 23. Only thou shalt not eat the blood thereof] He takes all occasions to mention this, because it was designed to preserve them free from idolatry (see xvi. 16. 23. 24).

CHAPTER XVI.

1 The feast of the passover, 9 of weeks, 13 of tabernacles. 16 Every male must offer, as he is able, at these three feasts. 18 Of judges and justice. 21 Groves and images are forbidden.

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 1. Observe the month of Abib, and keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, according to the order, as we read there, ver. 2. So the passover which Moses bid them remember the day when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xiii. 3), which comprehends both that which is properly called day and night.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover] The word passover signifies here not only the lamb (which was properly called pesach, or passover), which was offered the fourteenth day at even, but all the paschal sacrifices which followed after, as appears by the next words [*"of the flock, and of the herd"].

Which sacrifices were appointed for all the seven days of unleavened bread (Numb. xviii. 17—19, &c.). See Bochartus in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50, where he shows at large that the word passover is here a general word, comprehending the particular after-mentioned (p. 565, 566), and thus translates these words (which he justifies by many like instances). Thou shalt therefore sacrifice the passover clean and the clean person shall eat it alike, as the roebuck, and as the hart.

23 Only thou shalt not eat the blood thereof; thou shalt pour it upon the ground as water.

3 Thou shalt eat no leavened bread with it; seven days shalt thou eat unleavened bread therewith, even the bread of affliction; for thou camest forth out of the land of Egypt in haste; that unto the Lord thy God," viz. "of the flock and of the herd." Which last words are added exegetically, to explain what that passover was which they were to offer unto the Lord. Such sacrifices as were offered in the solemn passover of Hezekiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 29, and of Josiah, 2 Chron. xxxv. 7—9, where it is apparent, that the king and the princes gave to the people, and to the priests, oxen as well as sheep, lepasachim, for the passover-offerings. And thus it is used in the New Testament, John xviii. 28, where it is said, the Jews would not go into the judgmenthall, lest they should be defiled; "but that they might eat the passover," i. e. these passover-offerings, which were holy things, of which none might eat in their unfitness.

In the place which the Lord shall choose] At the sanctuary, as hath been often said, xii. 5. 11, &c. where all sacrifices were to be offered.

Ver. 3. Thou shalt eat no leavened bread with it] That is, with the passover before mentioned. Which is a demonstration that all the sacrifices of the flock, and of the herd, spoken of in the foregoing verse, are comprehended under the name of passover. For with the lamb they could not eat unleavened bread seven days, it being to be eaten presently in the evening when it was offered; after which followed the seven days of unleavened bread, which could not be eaten so long with the passover, unless passover signifies all the seven sacrifices.

and so thouneither after they home was, in he observed sonable of spoken. This is the bread of affliction which your fathers did eat in the land of Egypt. So Maimonides and others tell us (see Exod. xii. 17).

Ver. 4. No unleavened bread See Exod. xii. 16—20, xiii. 3. 7.

Every all night until the morning. This is a plain description of the paschal lamb, which was to be eaten in the even wherein it was sacrificed (Exod. xii. 10), which he forbears here to call the passover (though that name properly belonged to it), because he had called other sacrifices by that name (ver. 2), and would not have them confounded.

Ver. 5. Thou mayest not sacrifice the passover within in any of thy gates. Not at home, as they did when they first came out of Egypt, and that because it was a sacrifice; which was now required to be offered at the sanctuary, as was said before (xii. 5. 11).

Ver. 6. But at the place which the Lord thy God shall choose. From whence Maimonides infers, that even whilst high places were allowed, the passover could not be killed anywhere but at the sanctuary: if any man did offer it in a private high place, he was beaten, as he saith in his treatise concerning the passover, cap. 1, sec. 3.

At even. Between the two evenings, concerning which see Exod. xii. 6. After the offering of the evening sacrifice, they began to kill the passover, and continued this sacrifice till sun-set. At the season that thou comest forth. Then they were preparing themselves for their journey, and had warning to be ready, and eat the lamb with their staves in their hands, as men going forth to travel (Exod. xii. 11), though they did not actually go forth till the next morning.

Ver. 7. Eat it in the place. See Exod. xii. 8, 9. Turn in the morning and go unto thy tents. Unto their own habitations, which are called tents, because they had no other dwellings when these words were spoken. The only doubt is, whether he permits them to go home the next morning after the even before mentioned, or the morning after the whole feast of unleavened bread was over. It seems most reasonable to expound it of the former, that if men's occasions called them home, they were not bound to stay any longer at the place where the sanctuary was, but till they had eaten the paschal lamb; after which they might return home if they pleased. So Bochartus, who from hence proves that the most solemn days of the feast of unleavened bread were not observed like a sabbath, because men might travel home upon the first day of unleavened bread, as the whole nation travelled out of Egypt on this day, from of the sun, at the season that thou comest forth out of Egypt.

And thou shalt roast and eat it in the place where the Lord thy God shall choose: and thou shalt turn in the morning, and go unto thy tents.

Ver. 8. Six days thou shalt eat unleavened bread: and on the seventh day shall be a solemn assembly to the Lord thy God: thou shalt do no work therein.

% Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee: begin to number the seven weeks from such time as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn.

And thou shalt keep the feast of weeks.

Rameses to Succoth; yet pious people, who were able to bear so great a charge, were wont, no doubt, to stay the whole seven days before they returned home; because the first and last days of the feast were great solemnities. So they did in the passover of Hezekiah and Josiah, 2 Chron. xxx. 21, xxxv. 17. And there being special sacrifices to be offered every day during this festival (as was before said), Solomon ben Virge observes, that all the country thereabouts brought their oxen and their sheep to be sold at this time to those who came from far; so that the mountains and the plain were full of uncleaned wheat, and not a bit of grass to be seen. He adds also, that whosoever did not come up to this feast, all his goods were forfeited and converted to sacred uses (Schebet Judah, p. 378).

Ver. 8. Six days thou shalt eat unleavened bread; and on the seventh day shall be a solemn assembly. This is to be understood as if he had said, that after the solemn six days, they had eaten unleavened bread six days, they should conclude the solemnity upon the seventh day with a solemn assembly, or, as it is in the Hebrew, with a restrain; but still continue also on this day to eat unleavened bread. For this feast was to last seven days, and in all the foregoing books they are expressly required to eat unleavened bread seven days (Exod. xii. 15. Levit. xxii. 6. Numb. xxviii. 17). A solemn assembly Which the Hebrews call azirth, of the meaning of which see Lev. xxiii. 36. Thou shalt do no work therein. That is, no servile work, as it is explained Numb. xxviii. 25, but they might dress their meat, which the LXX. seem to mean in those words, which they add, πρός οὖς ποιησίας τῶν ἱερῶν, "save only such things as shall be done to preserve life."

Ver. 9. Seven weeks shalt thou number unto thee. From the morrow after the sabbath, when they brought the sheaf of the wave-offering, as it is explained in Lev. xxiii. 15 (see there).

Begin to number—as thou beginnest to put the sickle to the corn. For they began to cut barley at the passover, as is manifest from hence, that Joshua passed over Jordan to enter into Canaan, in the time of harvest (Josh. iii. 15), and this was in the month of Nisan, when they kept the passover, as appears from Josh. v. 10, which month could not be called Abib, or "the month of new fruits," if some corn was not then ripe, viz. barley. This Josephus confirms, lib. iii. Antiq. cap. 10, which must be understood, as Hermannus Conringius observes (in his treatise De Initio Anni Sabbatici, &c.), of that sort of barley which was sown in autumn (as it is this day in Frisia), which required a stronger soil than that sown in the spring, and produced a much richer crop. See Mr. Mede's works, p. 335, who observes how very different their climate was from ours.

Ver. 10. Keep the feast of weeks The reason of unto the Lord thy God with a tribute of a free-will offering of thine hand, which thou shalt give unto the Lord thy God, according as the Lord thy God hath blessed thee:

11 And thou shalt rejoice before the Lord thy God, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite that is within thy gates, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are among you, in the place which the Lord thy God hath chosen to place his name there.

12 And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt: and thou shalt observe and do these statutes.

13 ¶ Thou shalt observe the feast of tabernacles seven days, after that thou hast gathered in thy corn and thy wine:

14 And thou shalt rejoice in thy feast, thou, and thy son, and thy daughter, and thy man-servant, and thy maid-servant, and the Levite, and the stranger, and the fatherless, and the widow, that are within thy gates.

15 Seven days shall thou keep a solemn feast unto the Lord thy God in the place which the Lord shall choose: because the Lord thy God shall bless thee in all thine increase, and in all the works of thine hands, therefore thou shalt surely rejoice.

16 ¶ Three times in a year shall all thy males appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose; in the feast of unleavened bread, and in the feast of weeks, and in the feast of tabernacles: and they shall not appear before the Lord empty:

17 Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God which he hath given thee.
to them, the more liberally they should offer a grateful acknowledgment to him. For all the forenamed three feasts had relation to the fruits of the earth, which God had blessed them withal, as well as commemorated former great benefits bestowed on their forefathers. To this might be added the harvesting of the harvest, Pentecost at the beginning of wet harvest, and the feast of tabernacles, when they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth. At which seasons all mankind were ever wont to be full of joy, and to offer sacrifices. So Aristotle tells us (lib. viii. ad Nicomachum, cap. 2), "As φρονίαν τειχισι και σύνοδον θεοτοκον γίνεται μετα των παντων συγχωρον. " The ancient judges and conventions seem to have been after the gathering in of the fruits of the earth, as a first-fruit, at which time chiefly they rested from their labors." And so Strabo, likewise (lib. x. Geog. p. 467), "It is common, both to Greeks and barbarians, to offer their sacrifices with a festival intermission of their labors, &c. and τρωταί φυσών ουσίων επιστημών, and so nature taught them to do," that is, to thank God with rejoicing and cessation from labors. For which he gives this surprising toason, ς της αμνος των ανθρωπών ανθρωπόματων, του δε ουσιος τοια τραπες προς το δεινων "for remission of labor abstracts the man from his troubles, and turns it towards God." This certainly was the ancient intention of all such festival times, as the heathen themselves could discern.

Ver. 18. Judges and officers shall thou make there. To see that these and all other laws were duly observed. Moses de Coetz, upon these words, makes this difference between schofetim and schoterim: that the former (viz. judges) were the senators in the several courts, who decided cases; and the other (officers) were no more than ministers attending the court, to keep the people in order, with a staff and a whip, and to execute the decrees and orders of the judges, whom they appointed not only in the court, but in the streets, looking after weights and measures in the market, and correcting offenders. Maimonides also makes them the same with our appontoirs, or those who, in the Roman law, are called officiales, as Constantine L'Empereur observes, p. 302. upon Cornelius Bertran (who mistook them for a sort of judges), and in the digests executores; and in the Testament dissertationem. Luke xi. 55. Josephus makes mention of them to have been public criers; and so we find them employed, xx. 8. Josh. i. 11. But then some of them, at least, seem to have been an honorable sort, like out heralds (Josh. xxiii. 2), and all of them were men of authority, though but young men (as Maimonides describes them), who had not attained the years and knowledge of the doctors of the law, and therefore unfit to be judges. For the Jews placed them next to their wise men, or doctors, and above their scribes and clerks, as Mr. Thornike observes, in his Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 94. But that they were certainly only under officers, and not judges, there is another argument; which is, that Solomon upon this account commands the ants, that they carefully do their business, though they have no schofer or schoter, Proverbs x. 2. and do "sing, But the men be not wise, nor understand no law." (Proverbs xxiii. 4.) and to force or affright them into it. In all thy gates.] That is, in every city, as Mr. Selden observes out of the Jewish writers, lib. vii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 5. sect. 1. where he shows they interpret it, "in all the cities of Israel, both within the land and without, where Israel had any jurisdiction." Which is so true, that they had consistories wheresoever they were dispersed, for the determining all differences arising out of the law, though not as to the power of life and death, which was seldom granted them by their sovereign. Thus we learn from Philo, that there was "in Alexandria the little chronicle, called Seder Olam Rasha, tells us of the like in Babylonia. And after the destruction of the temple, it is manifest, not only by the Jewish writings, but by Epiphanius and others, that there continued a consistory at Tiberias for many ages, &c. (see Mr. Thornike's Rites of the Church, p. 56, 57, and his Review of it, p. 56). But though this be granted, yet the word "in all thy gates" (as in all thy cities) may suggest also the part of the city where they kept their court, which was in the gate: for there, as I observed, Gen. xxxiv. 21. all public business was transacted in the time of Abraham and Jacob, and continued so afterward. Insomuch, that the highest court in Moses' time met at the door of the tabernacle (Numb. xi. 54), the gate among the Hebrews being the same with foroung, as I observed, among the Romans. As we see by 1 Kings vii. 1. where Elisha foretells at what low rates provision should be sold on the morrow "in the gate of Samaria." Where it is evident there was a place so spacious, that Abab assembled four hundred prophets there before him and king Jehoshaphat, who had, no doubt, both of them numerous attendants (2 Kings xxii. 10). And before this time, David, it is said, upon the news of Absalom's death, went up to "the chamber over the gate," and wept; which we may well think was the council-chamber (2 Sam. xviii. 33. And when Joab advised him to come down, and show himself publicly, it is said, "he rose and sat in the gate, and all the people came before him" (xix. 6). And therefore in these cities, which were so large, there was some place, I make no question, where there were benches for the judges. Which the Lord thy God giveth thee, throughout thy tribes.] In the cities of every tribe there was to be such a court erected, that people might have justice easily and speedily done. And the Talmudists unanimously agree that the number of judges was proportionable to the greatness of the city wherein they were placed, and of the causes which they judged. Where there were less than a hundred and twenty families in a town or city, there was seated the lowest court of all, consisting of three judges, which tried only actions of debt, or damages done by man or beast, or defamation, &c. But in cities where there were above a hundred and twenty families, there was placed a higher court, consisting of three-and-twenty judges, who tried capital causes. Josephus, indeed, differs from the Talmudists about the number, for he saith they were but seven. Both of them, it is likely, may say true, with respect to different times and places; for it cannot but be presumed that both he and they understood the state of their country in such public matters. But at the place where God chose to settle his sanctuary, unto which all the country resorted at certain times, there was the supreme court of all, consisting, as the Talmudists say, of seventy elders chosen by God himself, to assist Moses in the government, and ensnared with the spirit of judgor any such-like structure, for public assemblies to be held about them, though they worshipped there the true God. So Maimonides reports the sense of their doctors, “a statue or pillar signifies any work raised up, that religious assemblies may be made there, though they be for the worship of the Divine Majesty; for this is a practice among idolaters.” And so Pausanias confesses (in Achaiais) that in the most ancient times, among all the Greeks, μνημεία ἐπὶ ἀντί ἀγαλματίων ἤμεν, “ruin stones had Divine honors given them, instead of statues or images” (see Selden, lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, in the beginning; and Maimonides, of the Worship of the Planets, ch. 6, sect. 8—10, and Dionys. Vossius’s annotations there). Which the Lord thy God hateth. Hence it sufficiently appears, that this was an idolatrous practice; which is more odious to God than any thing else. And thus the Israelites we see understood it, being ready to take arms against their brethren on the other side Jordan, when they heard they had erected an altar there (taking it to be such a structure as is here forbidden); but were appeased when they understood that it was not intended for worship (Josh. xxii. 19).

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. Wherein is blemish.] Having warned them, as he had done often, against idolatrous practices, he here interposes a caution against profaneness in the worship of the true God; for it was a great disrespect to him, to offer any thing that was not perfect, the heathens being ashamed of such sacrifices.

Ver. 2. Within any of thy gates.] In any cities or towns within their country.

Ver. 3. Man or woman, that hath wrought wickedness.] Now he returns to the business of idolatry; which is the wickedness here said to be wrought, as appears by the next words.

Ver. 4. It be told thee.] Thou hast had information of such wickedness.

Ver. 5. Bring forth that man or that woman.—unto thy gates.] Set them before the court of judgment in the city to which they belonged (see xvi. 18).
Deuteronomy.

6 A mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall be that worthy of death be put to death; but at the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death.

7 The hands of the witnesses shall be first upon him to put him to death, and afterward the particular persons were tried and sentenced in the lower courts, but a tribe or a city, accused of idolatry, only by the highest court of all; as Maimonides and the rest of the Jewish doctors inform us (see Selden, lib. iii. De Syned. cap. 4, n. 3, and cap. 5, n. 1).

Stone them with stones.] This was a punishment of a particular person, as a city fallen to idolatry was to be killed with the sword; and a false prophet, who seduced others to idolatry, to be strangled (see xiii. 5).

Ver. 6. At the mouth of two witnesses, or three witnesses, shall—he be put to death.] No man could be convicted but by two witnesses, at least, and those of a good name, of good fame, and not convicted themselves of having borne false witness, &c. Many other qualifications, of lesser moment, the Jews required in a witness: which Mr. Selden reports, and the reason of them, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 11.

Ver. 7. At the mouth of one witness he shall not be put to death.] Because, though the witness was never so credible, it was possible he might be mistaken. But it was not likely that two or three honest men, agreeing in the same testimony, should all be deceived. Yet in pecuniary matters, the Hebrew doctors say, the testimony of one credible witness was sufficient to put a man to his oath for his purification. And they set a mark of infamy upon him, who, in such matters as are here spoken of, had such a single witness against him (see Maccot, cap. 1. sect. 8. and J. Coeh's annotations there).

Afterward the hands of all the people.] From hence same infer, that he was to be put to death at a public feast.

Ver. 8. If there arise a matter too hard for thee in judgment.] Now he returns to speak of the courts of judgment, which he had ordered to be erected in all their cities, when they came into the land of Canaan, (xvi. 18) who might find some causes to be so difficult that they could not determine them.

Between blood and blood.] The Jews, I think, interpreted this to mean, when two witnesses were, concerning monstrous women, and the tokens of virginity (see Mr. Selden, lib. iii. De Syned. cap 2), where there is a plain and obvious meaning of these words: That there might be a doubt whether a man had committed wilful murder, or only casual, and consequently, whether he should have the benefit of the city of refuge, or be taken from it.

Plea and plea.] As the former words belong to criminal causes, so these to civil. Some, concerning debts, or purchases of lands or houses, &c.

Stroke and stroke.] It doth not seem reasonable to me, that this should be interpreted of the leprosy (which is often called a plague or stroke), though the Jews so understand it, for that was to be judged solely by the priests; whereas he speaks also of other judges: therefore the meaning is, concerning any wound or hurt that was done to a man in his body. About which, if the judges could not agree, but were divided in their opinions, either about the fact itself, or about the punishment to be inflicted, an appeal was to be made to a higher court.

Being matters of controversy.] Or contention and strife; that is, disputes arising about them, which could not be determined by the judges in those courts below.

Within thy gates.] Where God had commanded judges and officers to be settled (xvi. 15). And therefore he speaks of the inferior courts of judgment, that were in the lesser cities of their several tribes.

Get thee up unto the place where the Lord thy God shall choose.] Where the supreme court was settled in the chief city of the kingdom. While they continued in the wilderness, the captains of thousands, and hundreds, and fifties, and tens (whom Moses constituted by the advice of Jethro), judged the cases of the people under Moses himself, to whom God joined seventy persons for his assistance; all hard causes being brought before him. But this authority of the captains lasted no longer than during their pilgrimage in the wilderness; for when they came to Canaan, the law, as I now observed, required judges and officers to be ordained in every city; who, if there fell any difference about the law, are here ordered to repair to the place where the sanctuary was, for there the highest court sat as the successors of Moses, and his consistory of seventy elders, (mentioned Num. xi. 24, &c.) who judged all difficult causes while he lived.

Ver. 9. Unto the priests the Levites, and unto the judge.] Who must be supposed to be resident in this place, where the sanctuary was. And these words, "the priests the Levites," the Jews understand as if he had said, "the priests of the tribe of Levi, or the sons of Levi"; for so he speaks in xxi. 5. And Mr. Selden produces a great number of passages, where the like phrase (lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2, 3), and shows they are so described (as the Jews think) to exclude all others that had been priests, before God took the sons of Aaron peculiarly to serve him in this office. But the Levites, as well as priests, they unanimously agree, were capable to be members of this great Sanhedrin; which, they all likewise say, did not consist only of priests and Levites, but of any other persons of other tribes of any other dignity. Nay, they say, if there were not one prince or Levite in the court, it was a lawful judiciary; for the high-priest himself, no more than any man else, had a place here, merely for his birth, unless his learning in the law was answerable: so Maimonides and others. And these other members who were not priests, nor Levites, they think are comprehended under the word judge, though he be in the singular number, may be thought to signify more than one, as appears from xix. 17, where it is said expressly, they shall bring the controversy there mentioned, "before the priests and the judges." And farther, that judge, after the manner of this language, may signify judges. Constantine I,”Empereur gathers from ver. 12, where priest in the singular number is used for those who are here called priests in the plural (Annot. in Corn. Bertram, p. 390).

But howsoever this be, it seems to me, that though the priests and Levites were not the only persons of whom this high court consisted (the members of which might be chosen out of any tribe where they could find men qualified), yet they are here first mentioned, because they were likely to be the most able persons to exercise this authority, especially in the first constitution of this commonwealth, when they were newly entered into Canaan. For all other persons were then busily employed in looking after the inheritance that was fallen to them, and settling the affairs of their several families; whereby they were rendered less able to attend unto this weighty office. But the tribe of Levi having no inheritance among them (as is often repeated in these books), and no care about husbandry, and such like affairs, had a full leisure both to study the laws of God and to judge according to them; especially being appointed by God to “teach Jacob his judgments and Israel his law,” xxxiii. 10. Besides, this court being settled at the place of God’s worship, where a great many priests and Levites always necessarily attended, they were most ready, without any inconvenience to themselves, to execute this power, having their maintenance from the public, which no other persons had. But otherwise, as I said, they had no more right than other men to be members of this court, which we cannot certainly say consisted of seventy judges, together with their nasi, i.e. their prince or president: nor that they always sat at the place here appointed; for they were sometimes great trouble to the land, and they were under the power of their enemies, which extremely disturbed their government, and made it necessary for God to raise them up extraordinary judges, because the power of this court was broken in pieces. So Mr. Selden himself acknowledges, that there were great intermissions of their sitting in the times of Antiochus Epiphanes, and of Herod the Great (ib. ii. De Synod. dr. cap. 14. n. 2). And therefore we shall not in the times when they were oppressed by the Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, and other cruel neighbours, in the days of the judges: and thus Grotius, Hermanus Corningius (to name no more), here understand the word judge, who is joined with the priest and Levites.

Unto the judge] The forenamed authors thus translate this verse, “Thou shalt come unto the priests the Levites, or unto the judge that shall be in those days.”

Where by judge they understand such as Othniel, Ehud, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Samuel, and others whom God raised up when they were oppressed by their enemies, and in great confusions, to govern his people; which they did with the highest authority, being equal to kings, save only that they kept not royal state or equipage, but are plainly called by that name, Judg. xvii. 6, xix. 1. xxi. 35. Now, though the priests and Levites (i.e. that court, of which they made a considerable part) were the ordinary supreme judges of controversies, yet the judge, when God raised one up, was endued with an extraordinary power above theirs; to whom the people therefore resorted for his decision. For just as all ordinary magistrates among the Romans gave place to a dictator, when they had one, so all the capital magistrates that God appointed him, who determined all manner of controversies, as, at other times, the other judges, whether priests or others, were wont to do (see Herman. Corningius De Republ. Ebreorum, sect. 39).

I know but one objection against this, which is, that those extraordinary judges were not fixed, as far as we can find, in the place where they executed their power, unless we rejudge of the office as was done by Eli and Samuel, who seem to have been settled there. But we must consider that they were not confined by their commission, which was not grounded on this law, to any one certain place, but left at liberty to live where they thought most convenient for the discharge of their trust, in the reformation of the people. And the truth of what I said concerning their supreme power, plainly appears in Samuel, who went up and down the country executing judgment, when Shiloh was destroyed, and had no court, like that which the Jews speak of, to assist him. But when he needed assistance, he appointed his sons to be judges (1Sam. viii. 1), of whom, when the elders complained (ver. 4), because they did not discharge their duty well, it was to himself, and not to any other persons; and they desire not a Sanhedrin, but king to judge them (ver. 5). When Grotius, to understand this, do not find that he was committed to the Sanhedrin, but only unto God; nor is any mention made of them in the choice of a king, or, after he was chosen, in the history of their kings, till Jechoshaphat’s time, no more than there is in the books of Joshua and Judges; where we read, that when there was no king (that is, judge) in Israel, every man did what was right in his own eyes; which is a sign that there wanted such a court, to prevent them in order. After the time of Jechoshaphat, who settled judges in every city (as I observed, xvi. 18), they continued, it is plain, till the captivity; but what number there was of them we do not know.

And enquire.] They were to lay the cause before this high court, and desire their opinion in it.

The sentence of judgment] They were bound to determine the controversy; and whatsoever sentence they gave, it was to stand good till it was reversed by other judges of the same authority; for the judges (who understand all this of the great Sanhedrin, and scan every syllable with great nicey) will have the words just before ["that shall be in those days"] to signify that every sentence must hold in the time when it is given: so that if this court determined a matter, which in aftertimes, by other judges of the same court, should be judged otherwise, that second sentence was to stand, being the opinion on old and new days. For this sentence was, in the judgment, the meaning of the law, by which they were all to be governed; and, if there was no tradition in the case, they judged themselves as well as they could.

Ver. 10. Of that place.] That is, the high court which sits there, or the judge who is in those days.

serve to do according to all that they inform thee.

11 According to the sentence of the law which they shall teach thee, and according to the judgment which they shall tell thee, thou shalt do: thou shalt not decline from the sentence which they shall shew thee, to the right hand, nor to the left.

Which the Lord shall choose] The Jews, who understand this only of the Sanhedrin, say, it was not lawful for them to judge causes, at least not those which were capital, in any other place (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 15. n. 6, 7, 10).

Shall shew thee.] Shall pronounce.

Observe to do according to all that they inform thee:] Some fancy that he speaks to the inferior judges, who brought the cause thither to have the opinion of this highest court, who were then to pronounce sentence according to it: but whoever brought the controversy before this court (when the inferior could not determine it), they gave the sentence, in which he requires the contending parties to acquiesce, and to do according to their determination; which did not concern questions of faith, as if men were to believe whatsoever they should teach them, but such civil or criminal matters, which they were finally to determine; so that men should not further controvert the matter, but rest in their decisions. For in all governments there must be an end of suits, somewhere or other; and God required all his people to submit to the sentence of this court: for so the words run in the Hebrew, “And thou shalt do according to the sentence which they shall shew thee, from the place which the Lord thy God shall choose” that is, from the supreme court of judicature, which resided where God himself did. For if men had been permitted to disagree to their sentence, the very end and use of this court had been taken away: as Maimonides speaks, in his More Nevuchim, par. iii. cap. 41.

Ver. 11. According to the sentence of the law] In the Hebrew, according to the “mouth, or the word of the law,” which they shall teach thee; that is, according to the interpretation which they gave of the law.

According to the judgment] That is, according to the order or decree which they made thereupon.

Thou shalt do:] Pay, suppose, the money, which they judged to be due to another man: for he doth not speak of their doing whatsoever they bade them (as if they could control the commands of God), but of obeying the sentence of this court, about those matters which were in question between one man and another (ver. 8), who were not to be judges in their own case, but rest in the judgment of those whom God had made the supreme interpreters of his law.

Thou shalt not decline from the sentence] They were not to make the least alteration in their sentence: for though they might think it was wrong, and the senate perhaps did really err, and be better informed afterward (which the law supposes, and in that case orders an expiatory sacrifice, Lev. iv. 13), yet it was not lawful for any man to act contrary to their present decree, nor to contradict the contrary, whatsoever his private opinion might be.

Ver. 12. The man that will do presumptuously, and will not hearken] This they understand, not barely of a private man, who would not stand to their sentence, but of an elder, or inferior judge, who presumed to contradict it; as Mr. Selden shows, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 3.

Unto the priest] It is commonly thought, as I observed, ver. 8, that the singular number is here put for the plural; and that the meaning is, if any man would not hearken to the highest court of judgment, which consisted commonly of a great many priests, he should die for his contempt: but they have a great deal of reason on their side, who insist upon the letter of this word priest, and of that which follows, or the judge (understanding both of single persons, and take the high-priest only to be here meant), who seems to be described in the next words, “that stands to minister there before the Lord thy God.” For when God did not raise up a judge to govern his people, the high-priest was the supreme governor under God until the days of David; and so he was after the captivity. Hence it is, as Grothus observes (lib. De Imperio Summarum Potestatum circa Sacra, cap. 9, sect. 4), that cohen is a name common to priests and princes: for, among a great many nations, especially those anciently, he shows, the priests had the highest power; particularly among the Cappadocians (Strabo, who was of that country, saith), the sacerdotal dignity was next to the regal; but howsoever this word be interpreted, the crime here mentioned was contumacy, in not submitting to the sentence of the highest authority, whether it were vested in one person or more, whereby the government was in danger to be broken; and therefore God orders such a person to be put to death.

Even that man shall die:] The Jews, who interpret this, as I said, of a judge in inferior courts, who presumed to contradict the judgment of the supreme court, have tempered the severity of this law by several explanations and exceptions; which have regard, either to the manner of passing this decree by the highest court, which an inferior disobeyed (and that was when a cause came before them upon an appeal, for it was not so criminal to disobey every sentence of the supreme court, but only such as these), or to the place where it was made, which was to be nowhere else but at God’s dwelling-place, or to the things about which the decision was given, which some have to be only petty matters: and the act of contumacy also was considered; for he was not put to death, they say, unless in open court he declared a contrary sentence. The death he suffered was strangling; and he could suffer in no other place but where this high court sat (see Selden, of all these, in the place before mentioned, n. 2—9). And it may be farther observed, that the prophets themselves were not the subject of the sentence, the sentence and judgment of this high court, by whom they might be sentenced to capital punishment, if they taught contrary to the law of God. But our Mr. Thorndike makes a doubt, whether the constitution which the Jewish writers mention about a rebellious elder (as they call him who taught any thing contrary to the determination of this supreme court), was ever in force at all? For it was avoided, because of the differences between the schools of Hillel and Shammai, who lived not long before our Saviour’s time; when, it appears by the gospel, that nation had lost the power of life and death (see Rites of the Church, ch. v. p. 256).

Put away the evil from Israel.] This may refer either to the evil person, or to the great scandal and dangerous example he gave, by resisting the highest 14 ¶ When thou art come unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, and shalt possess it, and shalt dwell therein, and shalt say, I will set a king over me, like as all the nations that are about me; thou shalt choose a king whom the Lord thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee; thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother.

15 Thou shalt in any wise set him king over thee, whom the Lord thy God shall choose: one from among thy brethren shalt thou set king over thee; and he shall be thy ruler; and thou shalt obey him; and thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the words which he speaketh unto thee out of that good land.

Ver. 13.] This punishment was intended to strike a terror into all the people, that they should not advance to the Gadars of the Sanhedrin, cap. 2. Inasmuch, that they have promised to make this an affirmative precept, “a king of the people should be chosen;” and quote this place for it. To which some learned men among Christians have seemed to incline; particularly Petrus Cunaeus, lib. ii. De Republ. Hebr. cap. 14. and Guill. Schickardus, in his Jos. Regn. cap. 1. Theor. 1. But Abarbinel himself contrads this; and so doth Josephus, who observes, that God intended they should keep their present government; but if they would have a king, he should be one of their brethren. For thus he interprets this place (Lib. i. Antiq. cap. 8), that “they should not affect any other government, but love the present, having the law for their master, and living according to it;” δε σαης φασιν ο ὧνες γυμνος εκείνος, “for it is sufficient that God is your ruler.” And then he adds, But if you desire to have a king, ἐπάνω μν ὁδρος ὠροσός, “let him be one of your own nation,” as it here follows in the next verse.

Like as all the nations that are about me;] Such as the Edomites, who had been governed by kings before the days of Moses (see Gen. xxxvi. 31).

Ver. 15. Set him king over thee;] Install, and receive him into the throne.

Whom the Lord thy God shall choose;] They could not elect whom they pleased, but the first king, at least, was to be appointed by God himself, who was the supreme governor. So the people understood it, when they desired Samuel, who was their chief ruler under God, to make them a king (1 Sam. viii. 5), but durst not to presume to set one up of themselves. And to confirm them in this opinion, Samuel saith to Saul (1 Sam. x. 1), “The Lord hath anointed thee to be captain over his inheritance;” and saith to all the people (ver. 24), “See ye him whom the Lord hath chosen?” And accordingly, when the lot was to be cast, to show who was to be their king, Samuel bids all the tribes present themselves before the Lord; and thereby breaking the bond of unity and peace.

16 But he shall not multiply horses to himself, nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to the end that he should multiply horses: forasmuch as the Lorn hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way.

17 Neither shall he multiply wives to himself, (ver. 19.) And when it fell upon Saul, and they could not find him, they inquired of the Lord, and the Lord answered where he was (ver. 22). In like manner, when Saul was rejected, the Lord himself manifested his will by an unusual bearing of his king, and settled that authority in his family. And to determine which of his sons should have it, God himself appointed his immediate successor, viz. Solomon. For so David declares to all the princes and the great men whom he assembled before his death: “Of all my sons, the Lord hath chosen Solomon to sit upon the throne of the kingdom of the Lord God of Israel!” (1 Chron. xxviii. 5.) And again (xxix. 1), “David said unto all the congregation, Solomon my son, whom alone God hath chosen, is yet young,” &c. But though it was thus in the beginning of this kingdom, yet God intended at length to make it hereditary, as appears from ver. 20 of this chapter.

One from among thy brethren;] I. e. Saith the tradition, mentioned by the Jews out of Tobiaph, the most select and choice person that could be found, not one of mean extraction or employment. This they fancy is meant by “from among thy brethren.”

Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother.] This the Jews extend to all offices whatsoever, as Maimonides reports their sense (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 20. p. 617.). And by thy brother some of them understand one that was an Israelite, both by father and mother; though others think it sufficient, if a king was an Israelite by the mother’s side. See there, cap. 29, which in his book De Succession. ad Pontificat. lib. ii. he shows was sufficient for any dignity among the Israelites, but only the priesthood. See also, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 9. n. 6. where he observes the Talmudists say, the great Sanhedrin was to see that no king but one ritually qualified was set up the people; and when there was such a court, may be allowed to be true; though all the power which they ascribe to their Sanhedrin over their kings, is by no means to be admitted; but is an apparent figment: for it is manifest out of the Bible, that their kings had that very power which they ascribe to the Sanhedrin: particularly, it is notorious that Solomon, by his own power, put Abijah out of the office of high-priest (1 Kings ii. 6. 20.), which judgment the Talmudists say belonged only to the great Sanhedrin. In like manner other kings judged prophets; which they appropriate to the same court.

Ver. 16. He shall not multiply horses to himself;] There is no certain number determined; but the Jews well resolve, that he was not to keep them for mere pomp and show, but only so many as were for use and service; to draw his chariot, for instance, and for the guard of his person; but he was to take care that he did not burden his people by too many, under this, or any other pretence: and therefore not to keep up a body of horse for war. For among the Jews their armies consisted altogether of footmen; there being no breed of horses in that country; and their people, who were all husbandmen and shop-keepers, being accustomed to labor, and to run swiftly as a horse (2 Sam. ii. 18. xviii. 19. 22, &c.). Certain it is, that in the days of David they had no horses in their army: for when Absalom lost the battle and fled, it was upon a mule that he endeavored to ride; and such Sennacherib was so prodigiously rich, that he was able to maintain forty thousand stalls of horses for his chariots, and twelve thousand horsemen (1 Kings iv. 36), yet succeeding kings could not keep up such an expense; but when they had occasion sent for succours from Egypt, which commonly consisted of horsemen. Now one of the reasons the Jews give why their king was so prodigiously rich was, "This king being already come up with pride; for a horse being a stately creature, his rider is often swollen with a high conceit of himself, as more than one of the heathen have observed (see Bochart, in his Hierozoicon, lib. ii. cap. 9)." Nachmannides gives another good reason, lest he should confide and trust in the power of his horsemen more than in God (see Schickard, in his Mischnat Hamennech, cap. 3, Theor. 10). But the chief reason is given by Moses himself in the next words, Lest they should be tempted to go to Egypt, with which country it was dangerous to have familiarity.

Nor cause the people to return to Egypt, to—multiply horses: Send his people thither to buy horses for him, it being a country that abounded with them, as Judea did with asses. For when Sheshak, king of Egypt, took Jerusalem by treachery (2 Chron. xii. 2), they left in the city three thousand horsemen in his army (2 Chron. xlii. 3). This shows how they abounded with horses in that country in those days, though in aftertimes they did not care to breed them. They might indeed have horses out of other countries, as well as Egypt, but not so easily, nor so good: which made Solomon send thither, and Pharaoh set a great price upon them; because he knew their value, and that they could not furnish themselves so easily with them elsewhere (1 Kings x. 28, 29).

Forasmuch as the Lord hath said unto you, Ye shall henceforth return no more that way. 1 Or the first words may be rendered, "forasmuch as the Lord saith unto you, and as he did now by him, that they should not maintain traffic with the Egyptians, at least while they continued idolaters. We read, indeed, that many Jews went thither, and Urijah the prophet fled thither (Jer. xxvi. 21): of which the Jews give this account: first, some say this was but a temporary constitution, which was not to last always: secondly, they distinguish about the way of returning thither; conceiving that they might not go thither out of the land of Israel, but they might go out of another country whither they were driven. Maimonides thinks they might go thither as merchants, but not fix their dwelling there. But the true meaning is, that they might not voluntarily go thither upon any account, at least while they remained, as I said, so corrupted in their religion and manners, as they were at this present: for there is an express law, Lev. xviii. 3, "According to the works of the Egyptians ye shall not do" (see Schickardus, in the for-named place, p. 76). Whence those words of the prophet Isaiah, where, when he saith the land of Israel was "full of horses," he adds, "their land also is full of idols" (Isa. ii. 7, 8). For by multiplying the one, they multiplied the other. And, therefore, though David did reserve some chariots and horsemen, which he took to his conquests, for his own use, yet he did not keep them up, lest they should be a temptation to men rode upon mules (2 Sam. xviii. 9, 1 Kings i. 33, 34, 41), as they had done in the days of the judges (Judg. v. 10. 4. xii. 14).

And it shall be, when he sitteth upon the throne of his kingdom, that he shall write him a Ver. 17. Neither shall he multiply wives to himself; This is not a prohibition to take more wives, but one, because he had to have an excessive number, after the manner of the eastern kings, whom Solomon seems to have imitated: I see no ground for what the Jews say, that he might have eighteen (see Schickard, in the book above named, cap. 3, Theor. 9. Selden's Uxor. Hebr. lib. i. cap. 8. Buxtorf. De Sponsals. par. i. sect. 40). For the proof which R. Solomon and Deechin give of it is very weak; which is, that David speaks of having many wives: But those here mentioned (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 9. n. 5). Which Grotius, indeed, endeavors to soften, by affirming that these lashes were no disgrace to him, because he received them voluntarily, in token of his repentance: and therefore was not scourged by the common executioner, but by such a person as he himself chose to give this correction; and he received also such a number of stripes as he himself pleased more (De Jure Omnium et Pacis, cap. 3, sect. 20). But this is directly against Maimonides, who saith, in downright words, that the Sanhedrin appointed this chastisement; as Selden observes in another place (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 9. n. 5). And there is no example in the whole book of God of any such jurisdiction which the Sanhedrin had over their kings; but all this may well be looked upon as a more invention of the Jewish doctors, to magnify the power of their great council.

That his heart turn not away: From all serious business and employment, whilst he was careless and studying to please a multitude of women: some understand it, lest they turned his heart away from God, and the duties of piety, of which there was great danger, if he married worshippers of strange gods, as Solomon did. Others, I should think it might be interpreted, of turning his thoughts from winding his people, and their good and welfare; which must needs suffer much, when they were burdened with a great company of wives, who were to be richly maintained and provided for.

Neither—multiply to himself silver and gold. No more, saith the Sanhedrin (cap. 9), than would pay stipends to his servants, &c. Others of them scan the words more nicely: and observe, that, first, he is forbidden to multiply silver and gold greatly, that is, to content himself with moderate riches, and not set himself to heap up treasure, which could not be done commonly without great oppression of his subjects. And, secondly, he is forbidden to multiply himself to himself: but for the public benefit he might lay up money in the treasury at the temple, though in his own coffers, for his private interest, he might not. See Schickard in his Mischnat Hamelech, cap. 3, Theor. 11, where he produces their answer to this question,—How should the king be able to manage a war, or do any other great thing, if he did not furnish himself with good store of gold and silver? He might, say they, fill the public exchequer, though not his own private bags; and that for two reasons: first, he should be tempted to squeeze his subjects, and exact more from them than they were able to bear; as Solomon seems copy of this law in a book out of that which is before the priests the Levites:

19 And it shall be with him, and he shall read therein all the days of his life: that he may learn to fear the Lord his God, to keep all the words of this law and these statutes, to do them:

to have done, whose treasurer the people stood (1 Kings xii. 18).

Ver. 18. He shall write him a copy of this law in a book.

Not only of this book of Deuteronomy, but of the whole law, and that with his own hand, as a means to fix it more in his mind; insomuch, that though a copy was left him by his father, he was, notwithstanding, to transcribe one himself, as the Jews say, in the Gemara Sanhedrin (cap. 2. sect. 13).

All this is very agreeable to these words: but whether he was bound, if he had not written a copy before he was king (as every private Israelite, they say, was bound to do), to write two when he sat on the throne, may be doubted; for it cannot, without violence, be drawn from these words; and their authority is not sufficient to warrant it: they give, indeed, a plausible reason for it, that the one he was to carry about with him whithersoever he went, and to read in the other at home: but why one copy might not serve for both these purposes, I do not see.

Out of that which is before the priests the Levites:

He was not to write one word of it out of his memory merely, or any private man’s copy, but out of the book which was in the sanctuary, where the original and uncorrupted copy was in the custody of God’s ministers: there are a great many rules the Jews give about the right writing of this copy, which may be seen in Gill. Schickard Mischpat Hammenech, cap. 2. Theor. 5.

Ver. 19. It shall be with him.

Wheresoever he was, either in the camp, or at home, or in any other place provided it was pure, and free from filth, as the Jews limit it (see there, Theor. 6).

He shall read therein all the days of his life.

Diligently study it, not spending his time, as Maimonides glossey in drinking and making merry, but in learning the law of God (see there, p. 53). From the neglect of this precept, their kings became so ignorant of the laws of God, and of their obligation to observe them, that, in the days of the good king Josiah, he was strangely started at what he heard read out of this book of the law, when it was found in the temple, where it had long lain without any knowledge of it.

That he may learn to fear the Lord.

Be preserved in the true religion.

To keep all the words of this law.

Be acquainted with his whole duty, and perform it constantly (see Josh. i. 8).

CHAPTER XVIII.

1 The Lord is the priests’ and the Levites’ inheritance.

Abominations of the nations are to be avoided. 15 An unclean prophet is to die.

1 The priests, the Levites, and all the tribe of Levi, shall have no part nor inheritance with Israel: they shall eat the offerings of the Lord made by fire, and his inheritance.

20 That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren, and that he turn not aside from the commandment, to the right hand, or to the left; to the end that he may prolong his days in his kingdom, he, and his children, in the midst of Israel.

Ver. 20. That his heart be not lifted up above his brethren.

Not imagining himself to be above all laws, nor slighting his subjects as unworthy of his notice, but taking a due care to promote their happiness. “For as the Scripture (saith Maimonides) provided the king should have great honour done him, obliging all to reverence him, so it commands him to be lowly in heart, and not carry himself insolently: let him be gracious, and full of clemency to little and great, so shall he go out and come in with the love and good wishes of them all.” Unto which Nachmanides adds this pious reflection: “If the Scripture deters kings from pride and haughtiness of heart; how unbecoming is it in other men, who are far inferior to them!” &c.

That he turn not aside.

Neither by changing the laws on pretence of making better; nor by abrogating them, on pretence of their inconveniency: but where the Divine law was not clear, or where nothing was there defined, he might by his authority make new constitutions, as David and Solomon did, as well in sacred as in civil matters.

To the end that he may prolong his days.

This shows that God intended to establish a successor right in that family to which he chose to give the kingdom, if they continued in a constant observation of his laws. And indeed, there is no way to establish and perpetuate a family in the throne, like the due observation of laws, though they be but human, not Divine laws: for as Aristotle truly said, “He that commands the law shall govern all, i.e. all things be ordered according to law”, διότι μελετῶν ὁ θεός τῶν θεών καὶ τῶν νόμων, ‘seems to command that God should rule, and the laws’: but he that bids a man rule without laws (according to his own will), ποιείτων ὁ δικαίος, ‘sets up a beast to govern.’” And above all things, he ought to endeavor to win the love of his subjects, by humility and clemency; as the same Aristotle taught Alexander, if we may believe R. Jedaja, in his book called Mibhar Happeninim, where he reports a letter of his to that great prince, advising him to gain the affection of his people by a gentle government, which is far better than to rule tyrannically by force and violence: “For to what purpose is it to have possession of their bodies, when the true possession is to be master of their hearts? get possession of their hearts by clemency, and that will draw their bodies along with them.”

3 The priest’s due. 6 The Levite’s portion. 9 The Christ the prophet is to be heard. 20 The presumptuous prophet is to die.

1 The Lord is the priests’ and the Levites’ inheritance.

Abominations of the nations are to be avoided.
They shall eat the offerings—made by fire.] Not the burnt-offerings, which were wholly God's: but all other offerings, of which a share was appointed for the priests the sons of Aaron (Numb. xviii. 9—11, 18, 19).

His inheritance.] That is, the inheritance of the Lord, of whom he spoke before, who had reserved certain oblations to himself and bestowed them upon the priests: They are mentioned Numb. xviii. 8, 9, and ver. 12—15, where he first speaks of the first-fruits, and the first-born, which were all "brought unto the Lord," and by him given to them. In like manner, all the tithes of the land are said to be a "heave-offering unto the Lord," ver. 24, where he saith, "I have given them to the Levites to inherit," so these two, "the offerings of the Lord made by fire," and "his inheritance," comprehend all that belonged to his ministers, whether priests or Levites.

Ver. 2.] The Lord had given them that part and portion of the offerings which were peculiarly his own; and therefore is said to be their inheritance, because they enjoyed his inheritance, as these holy things are called in the foregoing words (see Numb. xviii. 20, 24, and Josh. xiii. 14. 33).

Ver. 3. This shall be the priest's due] Besides those things that God gave them, which peculiarly belonged to him.

From them that offer a sacrifice.] Of peace-offerings, which are sometimes called simply a sacrifice (Lev. xvii. 5. 8. Numb. xv. 3), in which the people had a considerable interest.

Ox or sheep:] Under sheep are comprehended goats also, as I have observed (see Lev. iii.).

They shall give—the shoulder.] Together with the breast; as we read Lev. vii. 32—33.

The two cheks, and the men.] These were not given to the priests before, but were now added to their portions, being accounted the best part of the beasts: for, as the cheeks were the best part of the head, and the shoulder and breast the best of the other members of the body, so the men was the principal part of the entrails, as Maimonides observes, par. iii. More Nevechim, cap. 39.

By the men is meant the stomach; and in beasts that had four stomachs, that which is called by the Greeks πρωτοσαρκον, viz. the lowest of them, which had this name, because the digestion which is begun in the other, is here perfected and completed: and it appears that this part of the entrails was accounted by the ancients a great dainty, as Bochart proves out of Aristophanes, in his Hierozoon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 505.

Ver. 4. The first-fruits also of thy corn.] See Numb. xviii. 19. To which it may be useful to add this out of Maimonides (who hath distinctly represented the order wherein all oblations were made), that after the fruits of the earth were gathered, every man was bound to bring a fiftieth part of them, as a first-fruit to the priests, which was called trumah gedolah, "the great oblation," of which Moses speaks in this place: and next of all, he separated a tenth part of the whole from the rest, which was maaser sheni, "the second tithe," and given to the Levites (Numb. xixii. 24). Then, out of what remained, another tenth part was taken, called maaser enen, "the second tithe," which was every third year given to the poor, and in the two intermediate years, spent in feasting at the house of God (Deut. xiv. 29). So that, for instance, if a man had pressed out a hundred and two logs of oil, he sent two of them as first-fruits to the priest, and then ten more, as tithes to the Levites, and deducted nine parts more out of the residue for the poor; by which it appears, that one-and-twenty parts of a hundred and two, that is, a fifth part of the whole, was separated for pious and charitable uses (see Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 4. Theor. 15).

The first of the fleece of thy sheep.] This is comprehended under first-fruits, but not particularly mentioned before now; and though the quantity is not mentioned, yet the Jews have adventured to determine, that less than one fleece in sixty was not accepted. For so they say of all other first-fruits, that a sixtieth part of the whole was the least that any man gave; and he was accounted a covetous man if he gave no more; they that were indifferent good, giving a fiftieth part, and liberal persons the fortieth. By this means the priests were provided with clothes, and by other offerings with food. And the wool also, as they call it, of goats (which were shorn in these countries) is comprehended under the fleece of sheep.

Ver. 5. To stand to minister.] This was the office of a priest; to offer sacrifices unto God, and to bless the people in his name.

Now and his sons forever.] The family of Aaron, of which he is principally speaking. Who, when they were few in number, all ministered unto God; but afterward they took their courses of attendance. And, as the Jews say, there were eight courses before Moses died; four of the family of Eleazar, and as many of Ithamar's, which in David's time were enlarged into four-and-twenty courses (see Schlen, lib. i. De Successionibus in Priestice, cap. 1.)

Ver. 6. If a Levite.] But a Levite seems here to mean a priest (see ver. 1). For they only could minister unto God, and the Levites ministered unto them.

Come from any of thy gates.] From any city, in any tribe of Israel.

Where he sojourned.] I.e., Leave the country where he hath been wont to live.

Come continually at the altar, to do all the service of the sanctuary. The LXX. translate it, 8 They shall have like portions to eat, beside that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony.

9 ¶ When thou art come into the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee, thou shalt not

"He shall minister to the name of the Lord," i. e. to the Divine Majesty, who dwells there.

As all his brethren the Levites do.] As all those do who live at that place.

Which stand there] To minister unto him: this was the case of Samuel.

Ver. 8. They shall have like portions to eat.] This shows that he is speaking of the priests; for the Levites did not eat of the holy things offered at the altar: and the meaning is, that the rest of the priests who waited there, should allow him the same portion which they themselves had in the sacrifices.

Beside that which cometh of the sale of his patrimony.] Which was to remain proper to himself, and not be divided with other priests at Jerusalem (suppose) where he ministered. The Hebrew words are something obscure, being "besides his sales by, or unto, the fathers," that is, such possessions as their fathers purchased, and left to them: for though the priests had no share in the land of Canaan given them at the division of it, yet they might purchase houses, and goods, and cattle; and sometimes they purchased fields, as we read Abibath had fields of his own at Anathoth, Lev. ii. 37, which purchased himself, who was a priest also, purchased a field of his uncle's son, in his own town, Jer. xxxiii. 7, 8, &c.

But the Jews make a quite different construction of these three verses, which they understand in this manner, that if any Levite (i. e. priest, for they only ministered before God) came up out of the city where he commonly resided, out of pure devotion to attend at the three solemn feasts, which were held at the place where the sanctuary was (where they were bound to wait, only when their course came, but at these feasts might all come and minister in the sanctuary), his brethren, whose week it was then to attend, should both admit him to minister before God with them, and also give him an equal portion with themselves in the extraordinary sacrifices which were then offered at those festivals, except only those which were peculiarly assigned to them whose week of waiting at the altar it then was; who, by the ordinance of God, delivered to Moses and Aaron, (who, they suppose, are here called the fathers,) were to have the right shoulder of the peace-offerings. See Lev. vii. 33, where it is said, "He among the sons of Aaron that offereth the peace-offerings and the fat, shall have the right shoulder for his part;" in which none other was to participate. But why this should be called the sales, I do not understand, unless we interpret it as forsterus doth, venditiones, i. e. res venditas à patribus, "things sold by the fathers," that is, appropriated by them (to the particular priest that offered the sacrifice), as things sold are to those that buy them.

Ver. 9. Come into the land] The land of Canaan, which the Levites were prohibited to buy or sell, were about to bestow upon them, according to his promise.

Thou shalt not learn to do after the abominations] Now he returns to warn them again not to fall into the idolatry and the superstitions of the country whither they were going (see Lev. xvii. 3).

Ver. 10. There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through the fire.] This was the most abominable idolatry practised in that country whither they were going, who consecrated their children in this manner to learn to do after the abominations of those nations.

10 There shall not be found among you any one that maketh his son or his daughter to pass through Moloch, or the sun, of which I have said sufficient, Lev. xviii. 21. Therefore I shall only add here that this wicked custom seems to have flowed from this country of the Phenicians and Tyrians unto the Carthaginians; who were guilty of the impiety of sacrificing their children, as they did also here unto Moloch, Lev. xx. 2, 3, which spread itself, in the same manner, over all the world, as many have shown; particularly Joh. Geissius, in his treatise De Victoribus Humanis, par. i. cap. 11, and it was found among the Americans, when that new world was discovered (see also par. ii. cap. 5).

Or that useth divination.] Of which there were many sorts; and one was, by taking into the bowels of their sacrifices, particularly of human sacrifices; by the observation of which they pretended to fortell things, as many authors testify. Yea, they offered little children on purpose, that thereby they might make their auguries, as the same Geissius hath observed in that book (cap. 21). Unto which, perhaps, there is a peculiar respect in this place; for I find most of the things here mentioned, joined in other places with a making their children pass through the fire, particularly 2 Kings xxiii. 6, 7. Or, in the notes on xxvi. 6. And the prophet Ezekiel seems to intimate, that hereby they divined, when he charges the Israelites with this crime, xx. 26, 31. For he adds, "Shall I be inquired of you, O house of Israel," who have inquired, that is, by making your children pass through the fire?

It must be confessed, that the Hebrew words kosem kosemin (which we translate "useth divination"), are by many thought to have a peculiar respect unto such as used to divine by casting or drawing of lots. And the word, as our learned Dr. Castell observes, is so used in the Arabian language for "distribution of lots." Which sort of divination was much in use among the Greeks and Romans; and had been so, it is very likely, in more ancient times among the eastern nations: for nothing is more known than the Sortes Premestinae and Pativinae among the Romans; and the Dodonesae, and Dindymene, and many others, among the Greeks, particularly that at Bura in Achaia, where there was a cave in which was the image of Hercules; before which they, who resorted thither to inquire directions in any case, or the success of any affair, used to fall down, and say their prayers, and after that to throw the letters or marks upon which they fell, the divination was made; as Pausanius describes it in his Achaica. In other places they used them in a different manner, and the ancient Arabs divided by arrows, as our famous Dr. Pocock has shown in his notes upon Gregory. Abulfaragus's book, concerning the Original and Manners of the Arabs, p. 327, 328, &c. where he describes the manner of it, and shows that it was performed before some idol, and therefore was strictly forbidden, by Mahomet in his Alcoran, as a diabolical invention. In which he seems to have imitated Moses, who may be thought here to forbid such kind of divination; which was in use among the eastern people in the days of the prophet Ezekiel, xxii. 21, where we find the same word kosem, which that learned author thinks is illustrated by that Arabism. It is to be supposed, also, that they used to divine by a dead man's skull, as our Dr. Windet hath observed out of the Sanhedrin (cap. 7), and Maimonides.
through the fire, or that useth divination, or an observer of times, or an enchanter, or a witch, 11 Or a charmer, or a consultant with familiar spirits, or a wizard, or a necromancer.
12 For all that do these things are an abomigine Moses wrought all his miracles by the virtue of it. Maimonides, indeed, was so sober as to reject this common conceit, condemning those who think there was a power in the very letters and pronunciation of the word (lib. I. More Nevochim, cap. 62).

A consultant with familiar spirits, or a wizard.] Of these two see what I have noted, Lev. xix. 31. and Lev. xx. 26. A necromancer.] In the Hebrew, "one that seeks to, or inquires of, the dead." It is not easy to tell wherein this differs from one that had a familiar spirit, as we translate it. For the woman whom Saul consulted, who had a spirit, called Oboth, inquired also after this manner; their spirit, it seems, teaching such persons to call for the dead to appear to them; but some, perhaps, had not such a spirit, who, notwithstanding consulted the dead, by going to their graves in the night, and there lying down, and muttering certain words with a low voice, that they might have communion with them by dreams, or by their appearing to them: unto which the prophet Isaiah is thought to allude, viii. 19. xxix. 4. Maimonides, in Apoda Zara, cap. II. sect. 13. thus describes a necromancer: he is one, who, having fulfilled hirings with fasting, goes to the burying-place, and there lies down, and falls asleep; and then the dead appear to him, and tell him what he desires. Such are also who put on a certain kind of garment, speak some uncouth words, and make a fume, and then lie down alone, that the dead whom they desire may come to them, and discourse with them in their sleep.

The same purpose Aben Ezra. To this the gentiles were very prone; and it was thought so high an attainment to come to this knowledge, that Julian the apostate, who was ambitious to be acquainted with all the heathen mysteries, secretly practised this necromancy, in the most retired part of his palace, cutting up the bodies of virgins and boys to bring up the dead to him; which was far more impious than what the Talmudists say (in the title Berzoth), that such kind of people were wont to burn the seconding of a black cat, when she had her first kittens, and beating it very small, put some of the powder upon their eye, whereupon demons appeared to them (see Greg. Nazianz, in his invectives against Julian, p. 91, and St. Chrysostom, in his oration upon St. Babylas). I shall only add, that this was not only privately practised among the gentiles, but there were also public places to which men resorted to consult the dead, particularly at Thapsos, near to the river Acheron, where Herodotus, lib. v. mentions a necromancer; and Plutarch (to name no more) mentions another at Heraclea, which Pausanias, in his distress, went to consult, as he relates in the life of Cimon.

Ver. 12. All that do these things are an abomination.] Because they were invented by idolatrous people, if not by the suggestions of evil spirits.

Because of these abominations the Lord thy God doth drive them out] Expelled the Amorites and other wicked inhabitants of the country, where they practised these abominations; which, no doubt, had some relation to idolatry, and therefore were forbidden to the Israelites.

Ver. 13. Thou shalt be perfect with the Lord thy God.] This shows there was something idolatrous in all the forenamed practices; which, if they followed, it was, in some degree, to forsake the should be among them, to preserve them from going after such diviners as were famous among their heathen neighbors; and thus many Christian interpreters make out the connexion of these words with the foregoing. But though this may be allowed to be intended, and this promise be acknowledged to be partly verified in those prophets which God raised up, from age to age, after Moses, for further knowledge of his will (as the promise of a Saviour was in part verified in those judges and kings by whom God delivered his people from their enemies), yet it is very easy to see that he speaks of a single prophet, more eminent than all the rest; and that these words, in their most literal sense, cannot belong to any other person but the Messiah. So that albeit the continuance of prophets among this people, was a means to prevent all occasions of consulting sorcerers or witches; yet the chief ground upon which Moses dissuades them from such practices, according to the literal connexion of these words with the foregoing, "the Lord thy God hath not suffered thee to do so," i.e. to hearken unto observers of times and diviners, was, the consideration of their late mighty deliverance by Moses; the excellency of their present law, which God had given them for their direction; and their expectation of a greater Lawgiver in future times, when the first covenant should wax old, and prophecy itself for a long time fall, as it did before the coming of this great prophet, the Lord Christ. To this purpose Dr. Jackson, in his third book upon the Creed, ch. 21. parag. 19.

From the midst of thee.] It was a great honour to them to have such a prophet as is here spoken of as arising out of their nation; but as he was after a peculiar sort raised up by Jehovah, not merely by the external assistances or impulse of his Spirit (to use the words of the same excellent person, parag. 9), but by intrinsic assumption into the unity of his person; so likewise he was raised up, in a strict and proper sense, "from the midst of them;" being, as it were, extracted out of a pure virgin, as the first woman was out of the man, by the Almighty's own immediate hand.

Like unto me.] This shows he speaks of a single prophet, and not of a constant succession of prophets, there being none of them like to Moses, whom God himself distinguished from them all (Numb. xii. 6—8). And accordingly that Divine writer, who added those verses which are at the end of this book (concerning the death of Moses), testifies that there never rose in Israel a prophet like to Moses (see Deut. xxxiv. 10). It is commonly thought to be done by Ezra, who hath effectually confuted all the conceits of R. Bechah, Aben Ezra, Aburhimel, and other Jewish doctors, who take either Joshua or Jeremiah to have been this prophet. If Joshua, as some fancy, added these words, then he excluded himself from being the person; nor did Joshua act as a prophet, but as a judge or governor: and Jeremiah is acknowledged by Abobine Risserrau to be inferior to Isaiah; for though in his preface to his commentary upon this prophet he mentions fourteen things wherein he was like unto Moses, and saith he prophesied just forty years, as Moses did; yet, in his commentary upon the lesser prophets, he prefers Isaiah before them all, and censures the rudeness of Jeremiah's language, in many things preferring Ezekiel to him. So little do these doctors agree in their interpretation of this prophecy.
16 According to all that thou desiredst of the Lord thy God in Horeb in the day of the assembly, saying, Let me not hear again the voice of the Lord my God, neither let me see this great fire any more, that I die not.

17 And the Lord said unto me, They which can belong to none of their prophets which succeeded Moses (who were all much inferior to him), until He came, who perfectly resembled him, but was much superior to him (see ver. 18). And thus the ancient Jews understood this prophecy; for though Maimonides only saith, the Messiah should be endowed with wisdom greater than Solomon's, and should equal their master Moses, yet those before him proceeded a great deal further, This being a common saying among them, which Abarbinel himself remembers, in his commentary upon the small prophets, "He shall be exalted above Abraham, lifted up above Moses, and higher than the angels of the ministry." Nor is the cabalistical observation mentioned in Baal-Hatturim to be quite neglected; which is, that this verse begins and ends with the letter nun, which is the numerical letter for fifty, importing, that to the prophet here promised should be opened the fifty gates of knowledge, forty-nine of which only were opened to Moses, and that this verse also consists of ten words, to signify that they were to obey this prophet no less than the ten commandments: which observation, it must be confessed, is weakly grounded, but contains a most illustrious truth, and shows that they believed Moses here speaks of the Messiah.

Unto him shall ye hearken; As they had engaged themselves to do: it will appear from the following words.

Ver. 16.] So we read Exod. xx. 19, where they made this request unto Moses, saying, "Speak thou with us, and we will hear; but let not God speak with us, lest we die," In which words the whole multitude bound themselves solemnly to hear the words of the Lord, being delivered not immediately from his own mouth, but by Moses, as is more fully expressed in this book, Deut. v. 27—29, where God higher commends this good resolution in them, as Moses here observes again in the next verse.

Ver. 17. They have well spoken] He approved their desire, and resolved not to speak to them any more, as he did from Mount Sinai, with a voice out of the fire and cloud; but by Moses himself while he lived, and afterward by one like to Moses, as it here follows.

Ver. 18. I will raise them up a prophet] These words seem to have been spoken to Moses by God, when they desired God would not speak to them any more immediately by himself, but by a mediator. Then God was pleased to promise them a great deal more than they desired, which was to raise up another Prophet like to Moses, who should acquaint them more fully with his mind and will in as familiar a manner as Moses did, without striking any such terror into them, as they were in at the giving of the law, though the words of this prophet came from the mouth of God himself: in which two things the Israelites excelled all other nations (i. e. in that they had such an excellent law delivered by Moses, which was to be bettered by an everlasting covenant, made by this Prince of the Prophets). In respect of both (as the same Dr. Jackson expresses it), the name of sacredness, the name, was not to be much in vogue, as they were in the nations that knew not God, much less expected such a Mediator. In whom the Spirit of life should dwell as plentifully, as splendor doth in the body of the sun; from whose fulness, ere he have well spoken that which they have spoken.

18 I will raise them up a Prophet from among their brethren, like unto thee, and will put my words in his mouth; and he shall speak unto them all that I shall command him.
19 And it shall come to pass, that whatsoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him.

20 But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, which I have not commanded him to speak, or that shall speak in confirmation it was, that “he was the prophet they should all hear,” that there could not be a greater; as all strangers, both to their religion and ours, must agree, and they themselves cannot deny: for Nachmanides, relating, in a letter of his to the rabbins at Marseilles, how there was a man in those days, in the southern countries, who pretended to be the forerunner of the Messiah, unto whom great numbers both of Jews and Arabs resorted, tells us, that he being apprehended by the king of the country, and asked what miracle he showed to confirm his commission, he answered boldly, “Cut off my head, and I will come to life again.” To which the king of the Arabs replied, “There is no sign greater than this; which, if it come to pass, both I and the whole world will believe thee.” Whereupon his head was cut off, and there was an end of all his pretences; though some of the Jews were so mad, as to believe that, that they still expected his return to life. Thus R. Gedaliah reports in his Schalshelet Hakabalah.

Ver. 19. Whosoever will not hearken unto my words which he shall speak in my name.] This is the proper character of a prophet, to deliver in the name of God what he received from God. Thus did Moses: but Christ most eminently, as I before observed from John xii. 49, 50, where he saith, “I have not spoken of myself,” but the Father which sent me; he gave me a commandment what I should say and what I should speak, &c. whatsoever therefore I speak, even as the Father said unto me, so I speak.” Which is a perfect commentary upon these words of Moses, who here calls Christ a prophet, not a priest, or a king (though he was to be both), because he would not have the Jews mistake, and expect to find in his person the worldly grandeur of a mighty prince, or the high honour and splendour of Aaron; but have the greatest regard to the heavenly doctrine which he taught them, as he himself (he told them) was taught by the Father: “For I proceeded forth (says he) and came from God; neither came I of myself, but he sent me; and I do nothing of myself, but as my Father hath taught me, I speak these things.” John vii. 17. He speaks of himself his highest honour of all, to speak God’s words (ver. 47), in the name of God (ver. 49).

I conclude this with the remarkable words of the Midrash upon Ecclesiastes, which thus expresses the sense of this prophecy, “As was the first Redeemer, such shall be the last Redeemer.” Which plainly determine the prophet here spoken of to be one single person, the other, and that he is the highest of all, (see Huetius, in his Deomant. Exeg. prop. 7. n. 9.)

I will require it of him.] Severely punish him, so as to destroy him from among his people, as St. Peter interprets it, Acts iii. 23. And so this phrase is used, Gen. ix. 5. xlii. 22. And there was great reason for this severity, seeing they had so solemnly bound themselves to hearken to this prophet, when they desired God not to speak any more to them by himself, but by a mediator, which God thenDeserved. And I observed, ver. 18. A mediator of a better covenant, who should secure them from such dreadful flames, as they then saw, if they would hearken to him, as they promised to do; otherwise, what could they expect, “but a certain fearful looking-for of judgment, and fiery indignation, to devour the adversaries!”

For since “he that despised Moses’s law died without mercy, under two or three witnesses, of how much sorcer punishment, suppose ye, shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden under foot the Son of God,” in the open face of all the world? Heb. x. 27—29, which is a full explication of these words, “Whosoever will not hearken unto my words, which he shall speak in my name, I will require it of him:” or, as Osnakoel translates it, “my Word shall require it of him:” where Memra, Word, can signify nothing but a Divine person, distinct from him who speaks these words, even that very person to whom the apostle applies them.

Ver. 20. But the prophet, which shall presume to speak a word in my name, &c.] These words plainly suggest to us, that Moses intended, in the foregoing discourse, to admonish the Israelites to hearken diligently to the word of Christ; as that should at any time raise them to their own light; though it be most evident, if we examine the propriety of every word or clause in the whole context, they cannot be exactly fitted unto any prophet but Christ; unto whom the whole discourse is as fully accommodated, as a well-made garment to the body that wears it. They are the words of the same excellent person, so often mentioned, Dr. Jackson, book iii. on the Creed, ch. 21. par. 1, 2.

That shall speak in the name of other gods.] It was a manifest sign a man was a false prophet, if he spoke in the name of Baal, or any other god, but the God of Israel: or if he said, Such a star by its spiritual influence coming upon me, said, Worship me after this manner, or, Thus call upon me, as Maimonides (who gives an account of the several sorts of false prophets) speaks in his preface to Seder Zerait. But how should they know a man to be a false prophet, when he speak to them in the name of the Lord? For men might pretend, as some did, that God had sent them, and given them a command, when he had not. To which he answers in the next verses.

Even that prophet shall die.] He was to be strangled, say the Jews, by the sentence of the great Sanhedrin; for it is a tradition of their rabbins, saith the Geemara Babyloniui upon that title, that in the business of prophecy there are three sorts of persons, who are to be punished by the judgment of men, and three by the sentence of Heaven. He that prophesied what he did not hear from God (an example of which we have in Zedekiah, 1 Kings xxii. 11), or spake what was not said to him, but to another (an example of which they make Hananiah, Jer. xxviii. 11), or spake what he thought to be in the name of an idol (suppose Baal), all these were to be put to death by the sentence of the court of judgment: but he that suppressed his prophecy (like Jonah), or despised the words of a prophet, or did not observe his own words, was to be punished by the hand of Heaven (see Seldon, lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 6. n. 1).

Ver. 21.] Which was but a reasonable question, the being as great care necessary, not to have false witnesses, falsehood, as to what God hath spoken. And this relates unto such prophets as came to them in the name of the Lord: for if a man came in the name of any other God, there needed no other mark to discover him to be an impostor.

Ver. 22. When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord.] Predicting some wonderful thing to come the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not to pass, as a token he is sent of God to deliver what he speaks to the people.

If the thing follow not, nor come to pass.] For if the Lord had sent him, he would have accomplished what he gave as a sign of his mission; which not coming to pass, he was proved to be a false prophet, who spake out of his own heart, and not the word of the Lord. But here the Jews distinguished between a prophet who predicts evil things, as famine, or pestilence, &c. and one that predicts good things, as rain (when there is great need of it), and fruitful years, &c. Though the predictions of the former sort did not come to pass, he was not to be reputed presently a false prophet, because God is very merciful, and often repented of the evil, as he did in the case of Nineveh: but, in the latter case, if any one of the good things he foretold did not come to pass, he was to be taken for a deceiver; which they understand also of the very time and place, when and where he said the things he predicted would be fulfilled: and here they bring in the example of Hana-niath, the son of Azur, mentioned before, Jer. xxviii.
11, and see ver. 8, 9 of that chapter. But this doth not give us the true difference; for both God's promises and threatenings many times depend upon a condition, as appears from that famous place in the prophet, Jer. xvii. 7—9. So that the good things a prophet foretold might not come to pass, and yet he might be a true prophet; because the people proved unworthy of them, and God did not absolutely intend them. Therefore the true meaning seems to be, that if a prophet foretold such a thing as the power of nature cannot produce, and gave it as a sign God sent him, who would justify his mission by doing that wonder, and the thing did not come to pass, he was to be looked upon as not a man of God: for example, when Moses threw his rod on the ground, and said it should become a serpent, if it had not been turned into a serpent, he had been convicted of falsity: or a prophet said fire should come down from heaven, and consume the sacrifice which lay before him, which was the case of Elijah; if it had not come down, he would have been no more owned for a true prophet, than the prophets of Baal. And, as Maimonides well observes, if a prophet's words were fulfilled in one or more things, he was not to be judged a true prophet, unless every thing he spake in the name of God came to pass; which he proves from those words concerning Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 19, 20). "The Lord let none of his words fall to the ground: and all Israel knew that Samuel was established to be a prophet of the Lord."

The Jews also made this addition to the rule fore-mentioned of trying prophets, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. iii. De Synod. cap. 5. n. 3), that "whatsoever prophet had the testimony of another undoubted prophet, can be taken for a true prophet." By which rule they might have known the great Prophet whom God promised to them in the foregoing verses: for spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presum-tuously: thou shalt not be afraid of him.

John the Baptist, whom the whole nation took for a prophet, testified to them that Jesus was the Christ.
And besides all other undoubted marks of his being sent from God, his rising from the dead, which he himself foretold, was enough to satisfy all men of the truth of what he said: for though every prediction of what afterwards comes to pass, will not necessarily prove a man to be a true prophet; yet the fulfilling of a great number of things (not one of which fails, as was said before of Samuel), especially of such a thing as this, which was impossible to be brought to pass but by an almighty power, is an uncontrollable evidence of a Divine mission.

R. Solomon, upon this verse, hath a note which is worth our observation, though it be not to the purpose of Moses's words: "A prophet (saith he) that oids thee not observe some of the precepts, is not to be heard, unless he be known to be a man of eminent virtue, and upright life, as Elijah was, who bade them build an altar on Mount Carmel, even when the sacrifices upon high places were forbidden. But there was a necessity for it, that he might restore the true worship of God in Israel." Which should have made them hearten to our blessed Saviour better than they did, he being so perfectly holy and pure, that he challenged any of them to charge him with sin; especially, when he only laid aside some of their vain traditions, but conformed to all the rites of Moses:
so that if in conclusion we should grant that Moses (in the fourteenth and sixteenth verses, &c.), speaks of all the prophets that should succeed him (which it is certain he doth not principally intend), the Jews were impious in rejecting our Saviour, who came as a prophet to them, and had all the marks that a prophet could have of his being sent from God.

Hath spoken it presumptuously:] For it was an act of high presumption, and arrogant pride, for any man to pretend a commission from God, when he had not sent him. Which was done two ways, as the Jews interpret this, either when a man spake in the name of God that which was false, or when he pretendded that to have been spoken to him which was revealed by God to another (see Jer. xxii. 30). Both these were impudent impostors, and accordingly to be treated.

Thou shalt not be afraid of him.] Have no reverence or regard to him, though he be never so confident:
nor be afraid to lay hold of him, and endeavour to bring him to the Sanhedrin, to have their sentence passed upon him (as the Jews understand it), though he have never so powerful an interest to support him, and preserve him from punishment. Thus Maimonides, in the forenamed preface to Seder Zerain: "Thou shalt not be terrified, or averted from endeavoring to have him put to death, by his religion, goodness, or knowledge, since in his proud brags he hath spoken false things against God." Nor be afraid of such a person, and of his partners, was to distrust God, who is the defender of those that defend the cause of religion.
CHAPTER XIX.

1 The cities of refuge. 4 The privilege thereof for the manslayer. 14 The landmark is not to be removed. 15 Two witnesses at the least. 16 The punishment of a false witness.

1 WHEN the Lord thy God hath cut off the nations, whose land the Lord thy God giveth thee, and thou succeededst them, and dwellest in their cities, and in their houses; 2 Thou shalt separate three cities for thee in the midst of thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it. 3 Thou shalt prepare thee a way, and divide the coasts of thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee to inherit, into three parts, that every slayer may flee thither.

4 ¶ And this is the case of the slayer, which shall flee thither, that he may live: Whoso kill-7 Wherefore I command thee, saying, Thou shalt separate three cities for thee.
8 And if the Lord thy God enlarge thy coast, as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, and give thee all the land which he promised to give unto thy fathers;
9 If thou shalt keep all these commandments to do them, which I command thee this day, to love the Lord thy God, and to walk ever in his ways; then shalt thou add three cities more for thee, besides these three:
10 That innocent blood be not shed in thy land, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and so blood be upon thee.

a parenthesis, to show who should be preserved in these cities, and who not), being a reason why the cities of refuge should be placed at an equal distance in the several parts of the country, that the journey might not be too long to any of them, but a man might soon flee thither, before the avenger of blood could lay hold of him.

Because the way was long, and slay him.] If he could not have gotten thither in a short time, he might have been in danger to lose his life, though not worthy of death. For, as the law did not punish him that killed a manslayer, when he found him out of the bounds of the city of refuge (Numb. xxxv. 27), so it seems to have indemnified him, if he killed him before he got thither.

Whereas he was not worthy of death.] Which, in his rage, the avenger of blood did not consider; and therefore was guilty before God of shedding innocent blood, though the law did not punish him for it.

Ver. 7.] To prevent which mischief, God commanded, not merely one, but three cities, and those in several places of the country; where men might find safety, if they made haste to flee to them.

Ver. 8.] As far as unto the river Euphrates (Gen. xxxv. 1const. xl. 31. Deut. i. 7).

Ver. 9.] If thou shalt keep all these commandments] This seems to have been the condition, upon the performance of which depended the enlargement of their border. Which is more fully expressed xi. 22—24. And so the covenant made with Abraham (in Gen. xv. 18), is to be understood, as including in it this condition.

Then shall thou add three cities more for thee.] We do not read of any more added to these, though their border was enlarged in David's and Solomon's time; and that as far as Euphrates. But those nations which they subdued, were only made tributaries to the kings of Israel, who did not people and possess those countries; and consequently there was no occasion for such cities there; unless the Israelites had been the inhabitants of those countries, as they were the land of Canaan (ver. 1).

Ver. 10.] That innocent blood be not shed] As there would, if, upon supposition of such an enlargement of their borders, there had been no cities nearer to flee unto than these six; which were sufficient only for the land of Canaan, and the land they possessed on this side Jordan, where they now were.

8 So blood be upon thee.] The guilt and punishment of blood, in not taking care of the safety of innocent persons.

Ver. 11.] When there was a manifest design of killing another, and known hatred, he that committed the murder was to receive no benefit by fleeing to a city of refuge. And then a man was judged to hate his brother, when for three days together he had never spoken to him, though they had kept one another company; as I observed before out of Mr. Selden (lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 2. p. 473).

Ver. 12.] The elders—shall send and fetch him thence.] Demand him of the elders of the city to which he fled; that he might be sent to them, and tried by them, whether he was guilty of wilful murder, or ought to have the benefit of their protection, being innocent of that crime (Numb. xxxv. 12, 24). It is likely there were probable reasons given why he was suspected to be guilty of murder; and therefore they desired the matter might be examined; otherwise, if the case was known to be like that in ver. 5, they did not make this demand.

Deliver him into the hand of the avenger of blood.] That is, if they found him guilty of wilful murder; otherwise they were to "deliver him out of the hand of the avenger of blood, and restore him to the city of refuge," that he might not die (Numb. xxxv. 25).

Ver. 13.] Thine eye shall not pity him.] Nor take any satisfaction for the life of a murderer, as the law is, Numb. xxxv. 31.

Thou shalt put away the guilt.] By putting him to death.

That it may go well with thee.] By having no guilt upon them; as they had when they let this crime go unpunished.

Ver. 14.] Thou shalt not remove thy neighbour's landmark, &c.] The Jewish doctors think that this hath respect to the holy land (as they call it), and the terms of bounds which were set by Joshua in the division of the country, which no man might take away; for that made him both guilty of theft, and also of the breach of this precept; and consequently he incurred a double punishment, and was whipped twice as much as another offender (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 5, in the latter end).

This was a law among the Greeks, as appears by Plato, lib. viii. De Legibus, Ἱ διὰ τοῦ τετράδιον της ἰδιαίτερας &c. τῶν ἱππότων ῥητορικής. Let no man presume to remove the bounds of land; looking upon this, as being truly to remove things immutable?” i. e. to unsettle and overturn all things: Numna Pompius therefore made this crime capital. Which makes Josephus’s explication of these words seem more reasonable than that of the Jewish doctors, who extend this precept to the grounds of all their neighbour nations who were at peace with them: As περὶ αὐτῶν εἰσπεραχόμεθα, “as being the occasion of wars and insurrections,” which arise from the contentiousness of men, who would thus enlarge their territories, (lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 8).

Which may be thought a reason why Moses joins this to the foregoing precepts, about punishing mur-
CHAPTER XIX.

15 ¶ One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established.

16 ¶ If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong;

17 Then both the men, between whom the controversy is, shall stand before the Lord, before the priests and the judges, which shall be in those days;

18 And the judges shall make diligent inquiry;

If a false witness rise up against any man to testify against him that which is wrong;

Ver. 15. One witness shall not rise up] They that gave their testimony in any cause always stood up.

Against a man for any iniquity.] A single witness was not to be admitted, as sufficient to convict a man of any offence whatsoever, whether in civil or criminal matters. For an imputation into the fact was one enough; but not for the condemnation of him that was accused. Yet in pecuniary matters, one witness was sufficient to bring a man to purge himself by an oath (xvii. 6).

Shall the matter be established.] The accusation stand, or fall to the ground.

Ver. 16.] In any matter, whether against God, or against man. For though one witness could not condemn another; yet if it were proved he was a false witness, it was sufficient to condemn himself.

Ver. 17. Then both the men.] That ±, the accuser and the person accused.

Shall stand before the Lord.] They were to come, in cases obscure, to the supreme court, where the sanctuary was settled. Who sat, it is likely, at the door of the tabernacle in Moses's time (see xvii. 8, 22), and so might properly be said to try them before the Lord.

Before the priests and the judges.] This they all understood of the highest court, which consisted partly of priests, and partly of other great persons, whom he calls judges; under which name, the whole court is comprehended in the next verse (see xviii. 3, and Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 8. n. 2, 3).

Ver. 18. The judges.] The court herebeforenamed; who are all (whether priests or others) comprehended under the name of judges.

Shall make diligent inquiry:] For it was not easy to prove a man to be a false witness; and therefore the matter was brought before this supreme court.

If the witness be a false witness.] If, upon strict examination, he was found to have given a false evidence against his brother, in a matter which touched his estate, or his body or his life.

Ver. 19. Ye do unto him as he had thought to have done unto his brother:] That is, saith Maimonides, if he designed to have taken away his brother's life, he was to lose his own; if to have him securged, he was to be lashed himself; if to lose a sum of money, he was to be fined the very same sum (More Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41). But though in most cases a false witness was to suffer the very same kind of punishment, which he intended to have brought upon another, if his testimony had not been disproved; yet in some it was not exactly observed. As, if one falsely accused a priest's daughter of playing the whore, he was not to be burnt, as she should have been; but to be strangled as an adulterer. So J. Cook observes upon the title Maceoth, ad cap. 1, where the whole business of false testimonies is handled. But some foolish decisions were made by the rabbins, in opposition to the Sadducees, as he observes in his Annot. 20. in sect. 6.

Among the Athenians there was an action lay not only against the false witnesses, but against the person who produced him. Upon whom they set a fine; and they were made infamous. And if they were found thibhe guilty of this crime, not only they but their posterity were made infamous throughout all generations; as Sam. Petitius observes, out of Andocide, and others (lib. iv. in Leges Atticas, tit. vii. p. 359). It is something strange they were not more severe against such offenders, many of their laws being plainly borrowed from Moses. And among the ancient Romans, by the law of the twelve tables, false witnesses were thrown down from the Tarpeian rock, as A. Gellius tells us (lib. xx. chap. 1), which was altered indeed, in latter times, for such punishments as the judges thought they merited: but he there tells Phavorinus, that, if the old punishment had continued to their days, they should not have had so many false testimonies given as they then saw.

So shalt thou put the evil away.] This may be understood either of the false witness, or of his crime: the guilt of which was taken away by the just punishment of it.

Ver. 20. Those which remain] The remainder of Israel, who see him suffer in his kind.

Shall hear, and fear.] The end of punishment is to deter others from such wickedness (see xiii. 11. xvii. 12).

Henceforth commit no more any such evil] Learn to beware by other men's sufferings.

Ver. 21. Thine eye shall not pity.] He speaks to the judges, who were not, out of compassion, to moderate the punishment, but make it equal to the damage he intended to another. Examples he gives of this in the words following. Life shall go for life, &c.] Concerning this lex talionis, see Exod. xxi. 22—25. Lev. xxiv. 19, 20. And see Grotius on Matt. v. 33, 40, where he well observes, that the party injured might forbear to require this punishment; but the judge, if it were required, could not deny to inflict it.
1 When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies, and seest horses, and chariots, and a people more than thou, be not afraid of them: for the Lord thy God is with thee, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt.

2 And it shall be, when ye are come nigh unto the battle, that the priest shall approach and speak unto the people,

3 And shall say unto them, Hear, O Israel, ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies: let not your hearts faint, fear not, and do not tremble, neither be ye terrified because of them;

4 For the Lord your God is he that goeth with you, to fight for you against your enemies, to save you.

CHAP. XX.

Ver. 1. When thou goest out to battle against thine enemies.] Who either invaded them (as in Judg. xi.), or with whom they had a just quarrel, because of injuries done them, without satisfaction: such as that mentioned 2 Sam. x. 4, &c.

And seest horses.] Which the Israelites wanted (as I observed upon xvii. 16), their armies consisting of footmen; who were taken from the plough, or from the sheepefolds.

Chariots.] Which carried a certain number of men in them; and what they were called (as they called them) were very formidable. For they made terrible slaughters among the enemy, cutting down men as we do grass, with a scythe or sickle. The Canaanites had great numbers of them, Josh. xi. 4, and Judg. iv. 3.

Be not afraid of them:] The Israelites were trained up to confide in God, and not in horses (which their country, as I said, did not afford, and consequently they had no chariots), nor in multitude of soldiers. And we find remarkable instances of this, particularly in Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xx. 6, &c. 17), who followed the example of David, whose words are most memorable, Psalm xx. 7. "Some trust in chariots, and some in horses, but we will remember the name of the Lord our God." (see also Prov. xxii. 21). "For the Lord thy God is with thee." That was such an instance of his power, as made it unreasonable to doubt of good success, when he was present with them; as he always was while they continued faithful worshippers of him. The translation of Onkelos is here very remarkable; which is, "The Lord thy God, his word is thy help:" which plainly denotes another Divine person, the same with Jehovah.

Ver. 2. When ye are come nigh unto the battle.] Are about to give or receive the assault.

The priest shall approach and speak unto the people.] The Jews say there was a priest appointed for this very purpose, whom they call Mashuach Michama, "anointed of war," he being set apart, as they say, to this office by an unction, and that with the same oil with which the king was anointed withal. His office was to blow with the trumpets, to make the following speech unto the army, when they were preparing to join battle; and when they first went out, to exhort all new builders, planters, and married men to return back; and when they were drawn up in battalia, to exhort all that were faint-hearted to leave the army and go home (see Num. xxxi. 6). A great many of the Jewish Doctors thus explain this, particularly Maimonides, who may serve instead of all. See Schickard, Just Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 18, and Hottinger, in his Histor. Eccles. Seculum xvi. par. ii. p. 689, 690, &c. where he produces an excellent discourse out of R. Levi Barzelonita's Catechism, to show the office of this πασιμωχωτος "anointed for the war;" and the reason why he was appointed to it. For soldiers (saith he) in the time of war, have great need to be heartened and confirmed in their resolution. And because the more honorable any one is, the more willingly men hearken to him; there the law required, that he, who was to encourage others, should be a select person himself, and a priest, to whom they would be apt to pay a great reverence.

Ver. 3. Shall say unto them, &c.] Going from one battalion (as we now speak) unto another: or else, ordering the officers (mentioned ver. 5), to go out and speak everywhere what he did at the head of the army. And he was to speak in the Hebrew language, and no other, as the Jews say, in Mischna. Sota. cap. 8. sect. 1. And they have a conceit, that the Romans learnt both the form of encamping out of Moses's law, and also to make orations to their soldiers before they went to fight, as J. Wagenseil observes out of Stilte Hagibborn: though it is more reasonable to think, that common sense taught those that were leaders of others to encourage them to follow them.

Ye approach this day unto battle against your enemies:] Who often appeared very formidable, by the vast number of their horses and chariots, which the Israelites wanted.

Let not your hearts faint.] So we well translate the Hebrew word, be soft or tender. Which though it be a quality highly commendable with respect to God (2 Kings xxii. 19), yet the contrary became them towards their and his enemies.

Fear not, and do not tremble.] Trembling, or as the Hebrew word is, "making haste," i.e. running away, is the effect of fear.

Neither be ye terrified.] Sometimes a great dread of danger made men run away; and sometimes so dismayed them that they could not stir, much less strike a stroke.

Of some of the Jewish doctors fancy, that the four several words here used are opposed to so many actions of their enemies, whereby they hoped to strike a terror into them. "Let not your hearts faint," when your enemies brandish their swords, and clash them one against another. "Fear not," when you hear the prancing of their horses, and the terrible rattling of their chariots. "And do not tremble," when they shout, as if they were sure of victory. "Neither be ye terrified," when ye hear the trumpet sound an alarm to the battle. See Moses Ketotzis (see Schickard, cap. 5. Theor. 16, p. 115). And such a passage Wegensel observes out of Philostratus, lib. ii. cap. 5, upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 8. sect. ii. p. 876.

Ver. 4. For the Lord thy God is he that goeth with
And the officers shall speak unto the people, saying, What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man dedicate it.

And what man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it? let him return to his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man dedicate it.

Sometimes the ark of God’s presence went before them, when they entered into Canaan (Josh. iii. 3, 10, 11, &c.), and in the midst of them, when they compassed Jericho (Josh. vi. 9). So that God was properly then said to go with them, or “in the midst of them,” as the Vulgar Latin here translates it. And at all other times he was present, by his power, to aid them, especially against the people of Canaan, with whom their battles were said to be the wars of the Lord.

To save you.] To preserve them by the defeat and overthrow of their enemies.

Ver. 5. The officers shall speak unto the people.] This the Jews, particularly Abarbinel, think was spoken by the priest before mentioned, and then proclaimed by the officers, called shotetum, of whom I have observed enough before, xvi. 18, and other places. They that wish to see more may consult J. Wagenseil upon that title, in the Mischna called Sota, cap. 8. p. 854. But by whomsoever this was spoken, it seems most likely to have been delivered before they drew nigh to the battle (see ver. 2), at the first mustering of the army.

What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? i.e. Hath not yet dwelt in it. For at their first entrance to dwell in a house, they made a feast, which being the first meal they made there, was called chanach, or dedication: as the same Wagenseil observes out of Michol Jophi (see in cap. 8. Sota, sect. 3. annot. 3). And because a year is allowed to a man to enjoy his wife, before he be obliged to go to the wars (xxiv. 3), they allow the same time in these other cases, for the enjoyment of a new house, or of a vineyard; as many have observed, particularly Selden (lib. iii. De Synod. cap. 13. n. 1, and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16, 17). And they understand this, not only of a new-built house, but of a house newly come into a man’s possession, either by succession, purchase, or gift; yet not of such houses as were not fit for habitation, as v. Seldeii, Delitzsch, and Wagenseil (De Synod. cap. 3).

In which he seems to have forgot himself: for the Mischna in Sota, cap. 8. sect. 2. saith expressly, this is to be understood of him that built a house, wherein to lay straw, to make a stable, a barn, or a granary: because, as Wagenseil there notes, such places might in case of necessity, be turned into a dwelling house.

Then he returneth to his house, lest he die in the battle.] This was allowed in those wars only which they made voluntarily but not of those which were ex precepto, by the Divine commandment, against the seven nations of Canaan and Amalek, in which every man was bound to engage. And so are the other cases, which here follow, to be understood, as all the Jewish writers agree.

Another man dedicate it.] First enjoy it: for this word here does not denote any consecration (as in other places), but beginning to use a thing; which in our English language (as Mr. Selden observes in the place forenamed) we call “taking handel of it;” and so the Spanish Jews express it in their translation.

Ver. 6. What man is he that hath planted a vineyard, and hath not yet eaten of it?] Which he could not lawfully do for the first three years after it was planted (see Lev. xix. 23, &c.). And in the fourth year also go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man eat of it.

Ver. 7. What man is there that hath betrothed a wife, and hath not taken her? let him go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle, and another man take her.

And the officers shall speak further unto the fruit of it was to be carried to Jerusalem, and eaten there; after which, the fruit of the fifth year was wholly his own, when it was no longer sacred (as the Hebrew word challet signifies), but common for every body’s use. Aben Ezra takes the word in the sense of rejoicing; as if he had said, “Who hath planted a vineyard, and hath not danced in it?” for that was the custom (he saith) when they first enjoyed the fruits of their vineyards. And to this the LXX. seem to have had respect, when they translated it, αἰὼν δὲ ὁ ἱματισμός τοῦ γρατίου τῆς οἰκοδομής, “he hath not been made merry by it.” But the other notion is more proper; and the Jews understand it, not only of vineyards, but of all other plantations wherein there were fruit-trees fit for food, if there were five of them planted together in good order, such as R. Solomon and Wagenseil have described; and see Selden, Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 2. 3017, p. 394.

Let him also go and return unto his house, lest he die in the battle.] The ground, both of this and the foregoing proclamation (and of the next also), seems to have been, that the minds of such men were commonly very much disturbed, to think of leaving what they had taken a great deal of pains about, and enjoy nothing of it; which would naturally make them fight with less courage. So R. Solomon. And Josephus much to the same purpose: μὴ τοῦτο γὰρ γίνεσθαι φανερόν, &c.; “lest out of a longing desire after these things, they should be sparing of hazarding their lives; and, reserving themselves for their enjoyment, not fight manfully.” But many think this was a bare concession to such persons; who, if they could overcome their affection to all things, but the safety of their country, might remain in the camp, and go to battle. Yet Abarbinel disputes strongly against this, and will have all these to be precepts, enjoying such persons as are here mentioned, not to stay in the army, but to return home.

Ver. 7.] The Jews interpret this law, either of one who had espoused a wife, but not yet brought her home; or of one that had but newly completed his marriage. And whether he had married a widow or a virgin, an old woman or a young, it was the same thing. Yea, they extend it to him who had married his brother’s wife; but not to him who had married a person prohibited to him by the law, or him that took his own wife again, whom he had formerly put away, because she was not a new wife, as the phrase is, Dent. xxiv. 5, where the time being limited, how long such a man should be free from the war, viz. for one year, they extend it, as I said, to the other two cases; that so long men might enjoy a new house, or a vineyard, after the first use of them, as the law allowed them to enjoy a wife before they went to war (see Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 3, and Schickard in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17). And it must be confessed, that this is a law of great equity, founded in nature, that conjugal love should not be disturbed; but have some time to knit into a strong and stable affection, by an uninterrupted conversation together in its beginning. The Jews were so favorable in this matter, that they say, if five brethren were in the war together, and one of them was slain, leaving a widow without issue, all the remaining four returned home; because every one of them, in their order, people, and they shall say, What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted? let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint as well as his heart.

9 And it shall be, when the officers have made an end of speaking unto the people, that they shall make captains of the armies to lead the people.

10 % When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it.

11 And it shall be, if it make thee answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be in case those before him refused, was to raise up seed to his dead brother.

Ver. 8. The officers shall speak further] Make this new proclamation throughout the camp.

What man is there that is fearful and fainthearted?] This some of the Jews understand of a natural timorousness, which makes men quake at every danger; and others refer it to those that were old, in whom that heat and vigor, which make men valiant, were quite abated. Upon which account they would not admit one who had no children to go to war (if we may believe Maimonides), because he was not thought masculine enough; or rather, because they would not cut off all hope of his having posterity. But there are those who understand this of the terrors of an evil conscience (See Sota, cap. 6, sect. 5). For they did not do as we are wont in these days, who send the wickedest villains into the wars; but if they knew any man to be guilty of a great crime, thrust him out of the army, lest they should all fare the worse for having him among them (see Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 17, p. 121).

Let him go and return unto his house, lest his brethren's heart faint!] For the cowardice of some might enfeebled the rest. Yet all these who were thus dismissed, were bound (if required) to furnish the army with victuals and water, to clear the ways, and to take up their quarters; as it is in the foregoing place in Sota, cap. 8, where Joh. Wagenseil observes, that they, who restrain these offices only to the fearful, are mistaken.

Ver. 9.] This shows that what I noted, ver. 5, is true; that the foregoing proclamation was made before they marched forth to the war: for how should they march till there were captains chosen, to lead the several armies (as those companies, into which they were divided, are called), which was not done till he had spoken all the forenamed things. And if we translate the words as they may be out of the Hebrew [they shall place or set captains of the host in the head, or the front, of the people], still it must be supposed, that this was done before they stirred a foot; for no order could be observed without leaders.

Ver. 10.] I have often noted, that there were two sorts of war which the Jews undertook: one by the Divine commandment against the seven nations of Canaan; another voluntarily, when they themselves found just cause to make war upon any other neighboring nation. Now this precept many of the Jews will needs understand only concerning the latter sort of war; for the Canaanites were to be utterly destroyed, without mercy. But Maimonides and Moses Kottensis take it to belong to both sorts of war. So the former of them in express words: "It was not lawful upon any occasion, however, before they offered them terms of peace," &c. Only they think the Ammonites and Moabites were to be excepted by that law (xxiii. 6): yet they temper it thus; that if those nations desired peace of themselves, it was to be granted to them, though not offered.

And the most ancient writers of the Jews say, that Joshua sent three messages to the seven nations of Canaan before he invaded them, though he undertook the war with a command from God to destroy them: viz. if they did not submit to the summons which was sent them, either to flee, or to make peace; which was the subject of the first two messages.

The next was a denunciation of war against them, as they say in the Jerusalem Talmud, quoted by Mr. Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13, and see the learned J. Wagenseil, in Annot. upon Sota, p. 845. Maimonides was of opinion, that the Gibeonites had not heard of these proclamations, which made them use their utmost to procure mercy from the Israelites. But P. Canudos thinks it more probable, that they had refused, at first, to submit to Joshua's summons; but seeing him victorious, they betook themselves to that artifice, mentioned in the book of Joshua, when they could not hope for peace by any other means (lib. ii. De Republ. Hebr. cap. 20).

Ver. 11. If it make thee an answer of peace, and open unto thee] Accept of the conditions offered to them, which were three. First, that they should take upon them the observation of the several precepts of the sons of Noah, and consequently renounce idolatry. Secondly, pay them a yearly tribute: and thirdly, become their subjects (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 4, and Schickard, in his Jus Regium, cap. 5. Theor. 16).

All the people that is found therein shall be tributaries!] Here are two of the conditions before mentioned; and the first was necessarily supposed, because the Israelites were not to suffer any of their gods to remain among them. For though by serving the Israelites is not meant being made their slaves, yet it imports that they were to live in due subjection to them as their governors, who might employ them in their public works, as repairing the king's palace, the walls of cities, &c.

Ver. 12.] Without any further summons to yield upon conditions of peace.

Ver. 13. When the Lord thy God hath delivered it into thine hands] Of which they were not to doubt, ver. 4.

Thou shalt smite every male thereof] Which was a just punishment for their obstinacy; of which the men, who were here condemned to destruction, were the authors, and suffered the more justly, because they were told, no doubt, beforehand, that if they did not yield when conditions were offered to them, they must expect this execution.

Ver. 14. But the women, and the little ones, and the cattle,—even all the spoil thereof] Money, household-stuff, and all manner of goods;
CHAPTER XX.

15 Thus shalt thou do unto all the cities which are very far off from thee, which are not of the cities of these nations.

16 But of the cities of these people, which the Lord thy God doth give thee for an inheritance, thou shalt save alive nothing that breatheth:

17 But thou shalt utterly destroy them; namely, the Hittites, and the Amorites, the Canaanites, and the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; as the Lord thy God hath commanded thee:

18 That they teach you not to do after all their abominations, which they have done unto their gods; so should ye sin against the Lord your God.

19 ¶ When thou shalt besiege a city a long time, and bring it low by force of war, then thou shalt destroy it with the edge of the sword; that it be not rebuilt upon the face of the earth; lest the Lord's wrath be kindled against thee, and it return upon thee.

20 ¶ And if thou lift up thy eyes northward, and see the altar of Bethel, and the pillar of his witness which Shaharaim hath made before Baal, then say in thy heart, My Lord hath taken me far from my room.

21 But henceforth it shall be [with me] when I go up thither to pray; and it shall be, that, if I build an altar of stone there unto the Lord, and offer burnt-offerings and peace-offerings upon it, that the Lord will hear in that place, being moved, when I shall cry unto him.

22 Yet neither thou shalt worship there the images of their gods; for even their images shall be.destroyed, and thou shalt worshipping the Lord.

23 And Joshua dwelt in the land; and he died, being an hundred and ten years old; and they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, in the mount of Ephraim, northward of the city of Abel-shchem.

24 And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua.

25 And Israel took possession of all the land, according to all that the Lord had spoken unto Moses; and Moses gave unto the children of Israel the land according to their tribes.

26 And the days of Moses were an hundred and twenty years: and Moses was gathered unto his people. And he died, not of a violent death.

3:33, 3:34, and 3:35, as in the margin of the Septuagint.

3:35a The Lord shall grant thee thy desire.
time, in making war against it to take it, thou shalt not destroy the trees thereof by forcing an ax against them: for thou mayest eat of them, and thou shalt not cut them down (for the tree of the field is man's life) to employ them in the siege:

bear apples, olives, dates, &c. which were to be preserved both in war and in peace: except in a few cases. In war, if the enemy made advantage of them, for their archers to lurk and shelter themselves behind them, by which the Israelites were much annoyed, then they think they might be cut down to shorten the siege. And in peace, if they did not bring forth fruit, or if the fruit would not be so profitable as the wood would be for building, and other uses; or if they hindered the growth of better trees: in all these cases they might be cut down, as the Jewish doctors resolve. Who when they please, mind the reason of a law, and not the bare words; insomuch, that they extend this law to a great many other things, which they say might not be destroyed, if they were useful and profitable. No houses, for instance, nor garments, nor household-stuff; nor they were to stanch up fountains, &c. (see Selden, lib. vi. de Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 15, and Gull-Shickardus in Jus Regim. cap. 5. Theor. 18).

For the tree of the field is man's life:] The word life is not in the Hebrew text; but we add it to make out the sense. In which we follow many good authors among the Jews, particularly Aben Ezra, who observes many such elliptical, i. e. concise forms of speech in Scripture. As in 1 Sam. xvi. 20, where an "ass of bread" is an ass loaded with bread. So here the tree is a man, i.e. the life or support of man. Just as (xxiv. 6) it is said a man should not take the upper or nether millstone to pledge, kiph neshesh hu, "because it is his life," i.e. that whereby he gets his livelihood. But there are a great many who translate the words by way of interrogation (and the Hebrew will bear it), and, joining them with those that follow, make this the sense, "Is the tree of the field a man, that it should come against thee in a siege?" So the Vulgar, the Greek, and the Arabic translation, and the Chaldee paraphrast, and Josephus, as Mr. Selden observes (lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 12.), as much as to say, They need not fear any danger from the trees, as if they were soldiers that could fight against them. And if this sense do not seem dilute (as some have censured it), there is no need of rendering the words by way of interrogation, but only of repeating the word not out of the foregoing words, in this manner, "Thou shalt not cut them down, for the tree of the field is not a man," &c. Of this there are many examples, as Glassius and our Gataker have shown. And thus R. Bechai among the Jews expounds these words; and the famous Abarbinel, who thus glosses upon them: "It is not decent to make war against trees, who have no hands to fight with thee, but against men only." And this sense Grotius follows, lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 12. sect. 2. where he produces Philo for this opinion, and Josephus, who says, "If trees could speak, they would cry out that it was unjust, that they who were no cause of the war should suffer the mischiefs of it." And thus Onkelos translates these words, and those, that follow: "For the tree of the field is not as a man, that it should come against thee in the siege;" that is, they had no cause to fear trees, and therefore should not hurt them. But this is a reason against cutting down any trees whatsoever; whereas Moses speaks only of fruit-trees. From whence Grotius thinks that saying of the Fyungusarens takes its original, ζυμπον γραμμών και γεγονόν, &c., "trees that do not grow wild, and bear fruit, ought not to be hurt, much less cut down." And yet it seems to be more agreeable to the Hebrew words, than our marginal translation, which makes this sense, "That there are trees of the field sufficient to employ in the siege," so that they need not cut down fruit-trees to carry it on.

20 Only the trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy and cut them down; and thou shalt build bul warks against the city that maketh war with thee, until it be subdued.

Ver. 20. The trees which thou knowest that they be not trees for meat, thou shalt destroy] If it were necessary for the raising bulwarks (as it here follows), or otherways to distress the enemy, they had liberty to cut down trees that did not bear fruit; but not merely to make waste and desolation.

Thou shalt build bulwarks against the city that maketh war with thee.] From whence they battered the city and threw great stones into it; as well as begirt them round, that no provisions might be brought in to them. Thus we find they did in after times, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15. 2 Sam. xx. 15. And they must have had some such inventions in Moses's days; or else how could they take cities fortified with such high walls as are mentioned Deut. i. 32? Or to what purpose should they build bulwarks, and cast up banks, but from thence to batter the city with some engine or other?

Until it be subdued.] From these words the Jewish doctors conclude, that it was lawful to make war even upon the sabbath; because, having set down before a city, they were to proceed till it was subdued; which these words suppose might not be in a short time. Only they say, that the siege was to be begun at least three days before the sabbath. Thus these superstitious people, not thinking common reason sufficient to justify them in so plain a case, make the Scripture speak what it intended not for their warrant. See Shickard, in his Jus Regim. cap. 5. Theor. 18. where he alleges Maimonides in his Hiloth Melachim to this purpose. And Joh. Benedictus Carpzovius produces a plainer out of Hiloth Schabbath, where he delivers their sense in these words: "A siege is to be begun three days before the sabbath; and then it may be continued every day, even upon the sabbath, until the city be taken: and this may be done in a war that is voluntarily undertaken. For thus our wise men understand these words by ancient tradition, until it be subdued"
CHAPTER XXI.

1 The expiatory of an uncertain murder. 10 The usage of a captive taken to wife. 15 The firstborn is not to be disinherited upon private affection. 19 A stubborn son is to be stoned to death. 28 The malificator must not hang all night on a tree.

1 If one be found slain in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee to possess it, lying in the field, and it be not known who hath slain him:

2 Then thy elders and thy judges shall come forth, and they shall measure unto the cities which are round about him that is slain:

3 And it shall be, that the city which is next unto the slain man, even the elders of that city shall take an heifer, which hath not been what city lay nearest to the dead body, as it sometimes happened. But commonly, it is probable, at the first view they easily discerned this, and so did not trouble themselves to measure. It is a frivolous dispute in the Mishna, from whence they were to measure; whether from the navel, or the nose, or the forehead; which last seems more rational to Maimonides, who calls it the centre of the body. But they did not (if we believe the Jewish doctors), in their measuring, take notice of any city wherein there was not a court of twenty-three elders; and Jerusalem was always excepted (see Selden in the place forenamed, n. 3. and L’Empereur upon Bava-kama, p. 173), and Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 899. If the dead body lay nearest to the country of the gentiles, then they did not measure at all; but it was presumed the man was killed by them.

Ver. 1. If one be found slain in the land] This follows very properly after the law he had delivered about making war; because then the bodies of dead men were most frequently found. About which the wisest lawgivers took the greatest care that inquiry should be made, how and by whom they were slain. This appears by Plato, who, in his ninth book De Legibus, hath a law something like this, though far short of the solemnity that is here required to be used; as I shall observe in the conclusion of this statute.

Lying in the fields.] The Hebrew doctors here stick too much to the letter. If these words mean, they shall not hang them round to a dead body hanging in the air upon a tree, or hid in the sand or dust, or floating upon the water, which is extremely absurd.

Ver. 2. Then thy elders and thy judges shall come forth.] The great Sanhedrin were to send forth some of their members (so the Jews interpret it) to do what here follows. And indeed it may be thought that none but they could take any good of this matter, the doubt being to which of the neighboring cities (where the other judges lived) it belonged. Therefore the paraphrase ascribed to Uzielides saith, “Two of the wise men or elders, and three of the judges, were sent by the great Sanhedrin about this business” (see Selden, lib. iii. De Synod. cap. 7. n. 2).

Yet he observes, in another part of that most learned work (lib. ii. cap. 7. n. 2), that there was a sort of elders who were not ordained by laying on of hands, but only were venerable persons for their age and prudence, who, some think, might serve for this employment. And they called such elders zickne hashuck, “elders of the street, or vulgar elders.” But none, I think, hath discoursed more critically upon these words, thy elders, and thy judges, than our Mr. Thoradik; who observes, that there had been judges constituted to determine causes by Jethro’s advice (Exod. xviii.), the greater causes being reserved for Moses alone. For whose assistance God afterward appointed seventy elders (Numb. xi.), who made up the great court of judgment in that nation. Now they of this great consistory are called “the elders of Israel;” but they of other consistories, or inferior courts, are called merely elders, or “elders of such a city.” See Review of the Rites of the Church, p. 70, where he alleges this very place for it; and by thy elders, understands the elders of Israel; the lower elders being mentioned in the next verse. And so those of the great consistory are commonly called in the gospel: and in like manner, “the scribes of the people,” and thy scribes, signify there those of this high court. Whereas the bare name of scribes is extended further, to the inferior doctors of the law. As also the name of rulers, and that of “rulers of the people,” are to be understood with the like difference.

They shall measure unto the cities which are round about him that is slain:] That is, if it were dubious wrought with, and which hath not drawn in the yoke.

4 And the elders of that city shall bring down the heifer unto a rough valley, which is neither cared nor sown, and shall strike off the heifer's neck there in the valley:

5 And the priests the sons of Levi shall come near; for them the Lord thy God hath chosen to minister unto him, and to bless in the name of employed in this service, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides, in the place before named, p. 907.

Unto a rough valley.] The Hebrew word nachal signifies both a valley and a torrent. The LXX., Josephus, and the Vulgar, understand it as we do; and the following words favor this interpretation. But the Talmudists and the rabbins, who generally follow them, take it to signify a torrent, which is the sense of Maimonides himself; and the next word, ethan (which we translate rough), they interpret a rapid torrent. Chasikuni thinks there is some reason for this in the sixth verse, where they are required to "wash their hands over the heifer" in the water that is of the brook. I see nothing to hinder the putting both senses together, torrents being wont to run down violently from the mountains, through the valleys which lie beneath them, which is the cause that the same word signifies both.

Which is neither cared] Or rather, ploughed. Nor sown:} Being a stony, craggy ground, representing the horridness of the murder, and the cruelty and hardness of the man's heart who committed it. They that follow the other interpretation of nachal, understood the foregoing words, asher to jeesheth bo, which we translate "neither cared," as if they signified the torrent did not serve to water the neighboring ground: and these words to be meant of the soil which lay next to the torrent, in which nothing was sown. And, besides this variety, there are those who take ethan not to signify either that which is hard or rapid, but the most fertile ground: So R. Bechati, and lately R. Jose Abendana, in his marginal notes upon Michael Jophi, where he gives this reason for it; that the inhabitants of each city might be the more careful to prevent such murders, being in danger otherwise to lose the best ground belonging to their inheritance. For the land where the body was found (if we may believe the Mischna) was never to be sown any more (see Sota, cap. 9, sec. 5).

Strike off the heifer's neck] Coming behind the heifer (saith the Mischna), as the murderer was supposed to have treacherously surprised the slain man; and should have been thus used, if he could have been found.

Ver. 5. The priests] See ch. xvii. 9. 18. xviii. 1. Shall come near;] To see all performed according to the law, and to pray to God for the country in the words prescribed, ver. 8.

Her body shall every controversy and every stroke be tried:] They did not determine all matters whatsoever, but all of this nature; in which the law appointed them to take care things were done according to it. As in the killing the red heifer; the examination of the woman suspected of adultery by the water of jealousy, the leprosy, whether in men or houses, or garments. Thus the Hebrews explain these words (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synder, cap. 8). And so the Lord; and by their word shall every controversy and every stroke be tried:

6 And all the elders of that city, that are next unto the slain man, shall wash their hands over the heifer that is beheaded in the valley:

7 And they shall answer and say, Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.

8 Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy people

Bonfires here acknowledges, that they did not come hither as judges, but as directors; and that they might procure the lines, together with the elders, from all guilt of this crime.

Ver. 6. All the elders] If there were never so many elders in the city, they were all to clear themselves by doing what follows. Shall wash their hands over the heifer, &c.] In the water of the brook which flowed through the valley; protesting their innocence, in the words prescribed in the next verse. So Chasikuni observes, "As our hands are clean, so are we from the guilt of this blood." See Wagenseil upon Sota, p. 910, who thinks Pilate had respect to this rite when he condemned our Saviour (Matt. xxvii. 21), notwithstanding all that learned men have said to the contrary.

Ver. 7. They shall answer] Being asked, perhaps, whether they knew any thing of this murder. Our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.] That is, they professed solemnly they knew not who shed it, nor how the man came to be slain. And the Mischna beforementioned adds, that they said (for how can any one think that elders would be murderers?), "This man did not come into our city that we know of, and dismissed without necessary provisions; nor was seen by us, and permitted to go away without company." Which Maimonides expresses more largely in his More Nevoh. par. iii. cap. 40, where he represents the wisdom of this law in these words: "The elders called God to witness that they had not neglected to secure the ways, nor to set watches to examine diligently those that travelled, saying (as our rabbins express it), 'This man was not killed through any negligence or forgetfulness which we are guilty of, in not observing our public constitutions; nor do we know who killed him.' Now, by this inquisition into the fact, by this going forth of the elders, and the striking off the heifer's head, &c. a great deal of discourse necessarily arose about this business, which made the thing public, and was a probable means of discovering the murderer, by some or other who were there, or should hear of all this. And if any one came, and said he knew the author, then they forebore to behold the heifer: but the man being apprehended, if the house of judgment did not put him to death, the king had power to do it: if he neglected it, the avenger of blood might kill him wheresoever he met him. By which it appears, that this solemn process here mentioned tended very much to detect the murderer. Unto which this also contributed, that the place where the heifer's head was struck off might never be ploughed or sowed hereafter (as I noted before), which made the owners of that ground employ their utmost diligence to find out the murderer, that their land might not lie waste for ever; for they might not so much as plant a tree upon it.

Ver. 8. Be merciful, O Lord, unto thy people Israel, &c.] The priests alone pronounced these words, as the Mischna there saith; though Josephus (who often differs from the Talmudists) saith, both priests and elders prayed God to be propitious unto them, and to prevent the like evil from falling out again in their region (see Selden, lib. iii. De Synod. cap. 7. n. 5, 6).

The blood shall be forgiven them.] These are not the words of the priests, saith the same Mischna, but the Holy Ghost pronounces, that when they observed these rites, the guilt should be removed from them; which, in some sort, would have laid upon them, if they had taken no notice of a murder committed so near to their city, nor made inquisition after it, and expressed their abhorrence of it.

Ver. 9.] Sincerely protesting their innocence and detestation of this fact: which was to be done in the day-time, and not in the night; and the body of the heinous deceived, by his wife, or any part employed to other use. If the murderer was found before his head was struck off, it was to be let go into the pasture among other beasts; if after, he was to suffer capital punishment, that is, to be cut off by the sword, as the Mischna before mentioned explains it, cap. 9. sect. 7.

By all this it appears, that no ancient law made such provision for the discovery and expiation of secret murders as this of Moses. For the very best of them, which is that of Plato, enacts no more than this, that if a man was found dead, and he that killed him, after a diligent search, could not be heard of, public proclamation should be made, that he who was guilty of the fact should not come into any holy place, nor any part of the whole country; for if he were discovered and apprehended he should be put to death, Και έρν στη του παρόντος χρως ἐκδικητηρια- μένον ἄμωνον, &c. and be thrown out of the bounds of the country, and have no burial!" (lib. ix. De Legibus, p. 874.

Ver. 10. When thou goest forth to war] To a voluntary war against any of their neighboring nations, not against the people of Canaan, none of which were to be spared, if they stood out and fought, but destroyed by the Divine precept, which required this war.

Thou hast taken them captive.] As the manner was, to make them slaves to their conquerors.

Ver. 11. And seest—a beautiful woman.] It was indifferent whether she was a virgin or a widow, or a wife, according to the Jewish doctors.

And hast a desire unto her.] The plain meaning is, fell so passionately in love with her, as to desire to marry her, though a stranger, of another nation and religion. It is a common opinion, indeed, among the Jewish doctors, that a base sort of passion is here indulged; for it was lawful, they imagine, for a soldier to lie with such a captive once to satisfy his lust (which some make to be the meaning of this expression, "hast a desire to her," or, as it is in the Hebrew, "hast cleared to her,"") but not repeat it, unless he would take her for his wife: which they think was allowed to military men when they were absent from their wives, to prevent greater outrages, which were wont to be committed by the heathen. But the best nations severely prohibited all such abuses, as Grotrius observes, lib. iii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 4, sect. xix. 1. And though Shickard, in his Mischpat Hammelch, endeavors to make out the wisdom of this law in permitting a Hebrew soldier to enjoy a captive once (see p. 130, 131, and Mr. Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13), yet he cannot but acknowledge that some of the Jews do not allow of this interpretation, but are of opinion, that he might not touch a captive till she became a proselyte, and he took her for his wife. Thus R. Bechai, as Grotrius observes in the place forenamed, sect. xix. 2, "God would have the camp of Israel holy, and not defiled with fornication, and other abominations, as the camps of the gentiles." Unto whom Alexander himself gave a better example; who being extremely taken with the beauty of Roxana, did not abuse her as a captive, but vouchsafed to marry her, and make her his wife, which was justly commended, both by Arrianus and by Plutarch; and therefore I think it is most reasonable to expound this law, only of taking such a captive in marriage; which Abbarinel also shows is the most ancient interpretation of it, and hath the best authority on its side among the Jews. For though he acknowledges it is the common opinion of their wise men, that a soldier might lie with a fair captive once, whilst she was a mere gentle; yet herein they followed the doctors in the Babylonian Talmud, which is not of so great antiquity as the Jerusalem Talmud, where R. Johannes (in Masssecheth Sanhedrin) delivers the quite contrary doctrine, that it was not lawful for any Israelite to lie with such a woman at all, till the conditions, mentioned in the following words of this law, were fulfilled, when he was to make her his wife. And according to the judgment of this R. Johannes, Abbarinel explains this law in a large commentary on this place.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt bring her home.] The forenamed doctors, who are so indulgent to the soldier's lust, will have this to signify, that they were to observe the rules of modesty in the camp, and not openly lie with her before she came to his house. Thus, Maimonides himself, Mor. Nevochim, par. iii. cap. 41. But it is evident Moses doth not speak of any thing done in the camp, but of what was to be done when he returned to his house; where he was to dispose her, in the manner following, to be his wife.

She shall shave her head.] These and the following verses are variously interpreted, some taking these things to be done to her, with a design to abate his affection to her, that he might not marry her at all; and others, to prepare her, and make her fit for his bed. For shaving her head (which every one knows was used in mourning) deprived her of one of her greatest ornaments, and made her less amiable, and consequently might extinguish his affection, which was kindled by her beauty. So Clements Alexandrinus understands it (see lib. ii. Strom. p. 398, 399, and lib. iii. p. 456). And many of the Hebrews are of the same mind, that these things were ordered to lessen his affection to her, by making her appear less lovely in his eyes (see Schickard's Mischpat Hammelch, cap. 5. Theor. p. 134, 153). But there are others who take this to have been a kind of purification, and cleansing her from her gentilism; and a token of her becoming a new woman, that she might be meet to be made his wife.
13 And she shall put the raiment of her captivity from off her, and shall remain in thine house, and bewail her father and her mother a full month: and after that thou shalt go in unto her, and be her husband, and she shall be thy wife.

After that] Upon these words R. Johannes grounded his opinion, that, till a full month was spent in the aforesaid ceremonies, he might not lie with her, nor make any marriage but to a woman whom he might not marry her. And if she refused to embrace their religion entirely, Maimonides saith, they gave her a year's time to consider of it; at the end of which, if she remained still obstinate, they required her at least to observe the seven precepts of the sons of Noah, and so to become a proselyte of the gate; otherwise she was to be slain. But thout she was so converted, no Jew might take her to wife; by her marriage, Maimonides saith, was counted impious.

Those Hebrew doctors who think a soldier might enjoy her once, at the first taking her captive, have added another conceit to this, viz., that there was not only this month's time allowed her to bewail her parents, but that he that was to stay two months more, before he might go in to her: and if he might see whether she was with child or not, by his first enjoyment of her. For if she were, a great difference was to be made between that child, and those she might have by him after marriage. Concerning which, see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13, where he observes, they make Tamar, the daughter of David, an instance of this; whose mother being a captive, they suppose he lay with her as soon as she was taken, and had this issue by her; but afterward she becoming a proselyte, he made her his wife, and she bare him Absalom. Whereby it came to pass, that there was not such a relation between her and the other sons of David by other women, but that it had been lawful for Amnon to have married her.

But all this is judged by the famous Abarbinel (upon 2 Sam. xiii.), to be very absurd; neither does he believe that David would have committed such a fact, as to lie with a woman in her gentility; nor, if he had, that this child would have been looked upon as a gentle, since he afterward married her mother. And therefore he takes these words of Tamar, ver. 13, "Speak to the king, and he will not withhold me from thee," to be a mere put-off, as we speak, to get rid of his company; which Amnon understood very well, who, knowing he could not have her to wife, proceeded to force her.

Ver. 14. If thou have no delight in her, then thou shalt let her go whither she will. If at the month's end, or before, his mind was changed, and he did not like to take her for his wife, then he might neither with her any more (as the Hebrew doctors understand it), nor keep her any longer as a slave, nor sell her, or make merchandise of her (as the text here expressly orders), but give her liberty to go whither she herself thought good. This he lost, say the Jews, by his short pleasure he took at first. For other captives, whom a man had made himself master of; by the law of war, he might employ in his work as slaves, or make money of them; but one whom he had lain with, he was either to marry, or set her at but thou shalt not sell her at all for money; thou shalt not make merchandise of her, because thou hast humbled her.

15 ¶ If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated, and they have born him children, both the beloved and the hated; and if the firstborn son be hers that was hated:

16 Then it shall be, when he maketh his sons to inherit that which he hath, that he may not make the son of the beloved firstborn before the son of the hated, which is indeed the firstborn:

17 But he shall acknowledge the son of the liberty. This they ground upon the last words of this verse, which I shall show may have another interpretation. And therefore I shall not insist upon their sense (which depends upon the same words), who think Moses speaks of his not liking her after she was become his wife, her humor, manners, and conversation, being disagreeable to him; in which case he was to give her a bill of divorce as he might do another wife, but not keep her as a slave.

Because thou hast humbled her:] It must be acknowledged that this is an usual phrase, for having had earial knowledge of a woman, as the Scripture modestly elsewhere speaks, in the like case. It signifies so in the very next chapter of this book, Deut. xxi. 29. Judg. xix. 21. xx. 2, and many other places, where it is used for violence offered to a woman, which was the greatest afflication to her, as the Hebrew word properly signifies. From which I see no reason why we should depart in this place; for it was sufficient affliction and humiliation to a captive woman (as Cappozius observes, in his annotations upon Schickard's book, which I have so often named), that, after she had been brought into a soldier's house, and kept there a month, having her head shaved, garments changed, &c., in hope of marriage, she was rejected at last, when it should have been consummated. And thus Abarbinel here understands the word humbled, not of his lying with her, but of all the forementioned conditions, which were imposed upon her as a preparation for his bed, and of her disappointment after she had submitted to be baptized. And, indeed, the Hebrew word denotes any sort of annoyance and contempt, as Ps. lxxxviii. 9. lxix. 23. xx. 15. xcv. 5, &c.

Ver. 15. If a man have two wives, one beloved, and another hated.] That is, less loved; as the word hated sometimes signifies, Gen. xxix. 31. Matt. vi. 21. R. Solomon thinks that this case follows the other, because it might so happen, that, if a man suffered himself to be carried with too violent a passion towards such a woman as is before mentioned, it might turn into hatred, when he found her not to be agreeable to him.

And they have born him children.] Towards which it was likely he would be affected very differently, as he was to his wives.

If the firstborn son be hers that was hated:] As it fell out in the case of Leah and Rachel.

Ver. 16.] He speaks of sons; for daughters were not to have a double portion. And he speaks of sons (as the Jews will have it) born before the death of their father; to whom he divided his inheritance. For a posthumous son had not a double portion, as the Gemara upon Bathra saith (see Selden De Successionibus, cap. 7, p. 29).

Ver. 17.] He shall acknowledge the son of the hated for the firstborn, by giving him a double portion of all that he hath; for he is the beginning of his strength; the right of the firstborn is his.

Ver. 18.] If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son, which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother, and that, when they have chastened him, will not hearken unto them:

19 Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him, and bring him out unto the elders of his city, and unto the gate of his place; in possession of when he died; but not of that which was his in resverion after his death: as Mr. Selden shows the opinion of the Jewish lawyers is, lib. De Success. cap. 6. p. 24.

The beginning of his strength; See Gen. xlii. 4. The right of the firstborn is his.] By a very ancient custom, antecedent to the law, which made the first-born the head of the family, and gave him as much more as any of his brethren of the estate belonging to him, that he might be able to maintain and support the dignity of it (Gen. xxxv. 31). But if there was no son, and the inheritance was to be divided among daughters, the eldest daughter had not a double share of the estate; as Mr. Selden shows in the same book, cap. 8.

Ver. 18. If a man have a stubborn and rebellious son.] By a stubborn son, the Jews understand one that will not do as he is hidden, and by a rebellions, one that doth what he is forbidden. And they imagine this law is annexed to the foregoing, about the marriage of a soldier to a captive woman, because the issue of such marriages commonly proved refractory, or at least gave their parents great trouble. So Schickard observes out of Tanhuma. And they confirm it by an example out of Scripture, viz. the two children of David, Absalom and Tamar, who were both born of a captive woman, made a proscylyte: the former of which conspired the death of his father; and the other being ravished by Amnon, was the occasion of the death of some of his brethren (Mishapat Hammenelech, cap. 5. Theor. 17).

Which will not obey the voice of his father, or the voice of his mother.] Behaved himself so stubbornly but crossly to them; and with such contempt of their authority, as argued he had not only lost all filial affection and reverence to them, but would, if he could, undo them.

Will not hearken unto them:] Is never the better for admonitions, reproofs, and corrections, which they were bound to give him.

Ver. 19.] Then shall his father and his mother lay hold on him.] It is absurd to say, as the Hebrew doctors do (in their qualifications of this law), that his parents were with their own hands to apprehend him, and bring him before the court; though it seems reasonable enough, that both father and mother should agree in the complaint against him, and desire officers might be sent to lay hold of him. In which one cannot well suppose that they would consent to have such a punishment as follows indicted upon him, unless he were intolerable.

Bring him out unto the elders:] Who were to examine the proofs, and accordingly to pass sentence upon him. Concerning these elders, see ver. 3, 4.

Unto the gate of his place:] When the excommunication was wont to sit (see xxvi. 18). The paternal power among the ancient Romans was so great, that they might put their children to death, as they did their slaves, without any process before a magis-
And they shall say unto the elders of his city, This our son is stubborn and rebellious, he will not obey our voice; he is a glutton, and a drunkard.

And all the men of his city shall stone him with stones, that he die: so shalt thou put trate. And this some have taken to be a natural right; and imagined God would not have commanded Abraham to kill his son, but that it was a part of his inherent power. However this be, they were not thought fit to be long maintained with it; for God here orders, by Moses, that it should be committed to the public judges, as the most disinterested persons. Ver. 20. They shall say unto the elders] This seems to intimate the authority of parents was still so preserved, that their testimony alone was sufficient to convict a rebellious son, without any further proof. The Hebrew doctors, indeed, are of another mind, as I shall show in the explication of what follows. This our son is stubborn and rebellious] This is to be understood, say they, of a son that was no less than thirteen years old and a day; and so might be presumed to know his duty, and to be capable of being governed by counsel and good advice, and this is reasonable enough: but what they say concerning the time when he became his own man is monstrously absurd (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. p. 559, 560). What they say of a daughter, not to be comprehended under this law, may be admitted, because she was not capable to do so much mischief in a family as a rebellious son. He is a glutton and a drunkard.] These sins are nowhere made capital by the law of Moses, but when they were accompanied with rebellious disobedience to parents, who were to bring them to the public judges, as the Hebrew doctors say, that this son had stolen some of their goods, and sold them, that he might spend the money in these vices; under which others are comprehended, which usually attend them; and that he had done this, after he had been admonished and chastised: so that he was not to be punished as this law at last prescribèd, till he was grown incorrigible. For if it was evident that he was already disposed to be whipped, and not to proceed further till, upon a new complaint, it was proved that he had run into the same riotous courses since that punishment. Then, upon this second testimony (as they call it), the court gave sentence against him, that he should be stoned to death, unless the parents, before the sentence was pronounced, said they gave him their pardon. There are a great many little niceties about the quantity of meat and wine that he ate and drank; and other matters; with which I do not think fit to trouble the reader.

Ver. 21. And all the men of his city shall stone him.] This is such a severe sentence, that it inclines me to think, the parents looked upon such a son as so debauched, that he would not only spend all their estate, if he had it, but was inclined to kill them, that he might get it into his own hands. For the sentence of death is denounced, elsewhere, against one that struck his father or mother (Exod. xxi. 15), or that cursed them (ver. 17). It is not said, indeed, he should be stoned, but put to death; which they interpreted of strangling; this punishment of stoning being appointed for idolaters and blasphemers of God, to whose parents are to be reverence, being in God's place, with respect to their children (see upon the fifth commandment). And therefore other nations were very severe in their punishment of such children as are here described; and particularly the Romans, after the power was taken from parents to sell them, or put them to death, and the censure of them committed to the magistrates (see Hen. Stephen, in his Fontes et Rivi Juris Civilis, p. 18). And among the Athenians, Lysias saith (in his letter to Euphranor against Agorasaus), He that beat his parents, or did not show reverence to his parents, is to be punished as they were then in want. ἄνδρα ἢ γυναῖκα ἐπιτιμήσωσαν, "deserved to be put to death." The law indeed did not instruct that punishment, but only said αὐτὸς ὄμοιος, "let him be infamous," that is, as they expound it, he might not come into the public assemblies, nor enter into their temples, nor wear a crown in their public festivals; and if any such persons presumed so to do, they were brought before the magistrates, who set a fine upon their heads, and committed them to prison till they paid it (see Sam. Petitus, in his Commentary upon the Attic laws, lib. ii. tit. 4. p. 163). No wonder therefore Moses ordained this punishment, when a son was come to such a degree of profligate wickedness, that he endeavoured to undo his parents. Which some states have thought fit to follow in these latter ages; for David Chytravius saith, he himself saw an example of this severity at Zurich, in the year one thousand five hundred and fifty; where a disobedient son was beheaded, who had cursed his mother, and beaten her. So shalt thou put evil away See concerning this before upon xix. 20.

Ver. 22. And if a man have committed a sin worthy of death.] There were several sorts of capital punishments; viz. strangling, burning, cutting off by the sword, and stoning. Now the Hebrew doctors limit this unto such offenders as were stoned; of which punishment he speaks in the foregoing verse. But there being eighteen sorts of offenders, who were to be sentenced to this death, they put a further limitations upon these words; their traditional being, as they tell us, that they were worthy of death only in the cases of idolatry or blasphemy. So we read in the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 4. "All that were stoned were also hanged, according to the opinion of R. Eliezer: but the wise men say none were hanged but the idolater and blasphemar." And they add there, that only men, not women, were thus used; for which I can see no reason, but the sticking to the mere letter of these words; as if the word man did comprehend both sexes.

But if we examine the Scripture, we shall find this not to be true (that no men were hanged but that they were stoned), for the king of Ai was hanged (Josh. viii. 29), and five kings more (x. 26), and they were not hanged because they were blasphemers or idolaters (for then all the rest of the Canaanites should have been so treated); but because they were such enemies of God, as had rebelliously withstood the gracious summons of surrender. And there are other examples also which confute this; as, the two traitors that murdered Ish-bosheth (2 Sam. iv. 12), and the five sons of Saul (2 Sam. xxi. 9). It is more probable, therefore, that all those whom the Judges thought it to be such great offenders, that it was fit to make them very public examples, were hanged up after they had suffered the punishment of death to which they were sentenced. This seems to be denoted in the word chattah, which signifies sometimes a very great crime, as appears from Hosea xii. 8, where he speaks of...

God;) that thy land be not defiled, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance.

a horrid crime, whereby he had incurred the high displeasure of Almighty God. So that every one who saw him hang on that fashion was to think with himself, This man was under the curse of God, because of his sin; and unless he had undergone this curse, he could not have been buried, and put into the condition of the man that, when he had undergone it for his sin, then it had been sin in the people not to have taken him down, or prolonged his suspension longer than God imposed this curse upon him. And the land had been defiled, if, after this suffering which God had appointed, they had not buried him. To this purpose Abarbinel, who refutes several other accounts of this matter, particularly that of Sol. Jarbi, who thinks he was not to hang longer than till the evening, because it would have been a dishonor to the Sovereign of the world, after whose image man was made. This is followed by many, and even by Grotius himself, who gives no other reason of it, in his book De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 19. sec. 4. But this is a reason, as Abarbinel notes, why he should not have been hung up at all. It may be also usefully noted farther, that they say in the tract called Sanhedrin, that not only the malefactor, but all the instruments of punishment, were to be buried at the going down of the sun. Even the tree itself, upon which he was hanged, was to be buried, "that no memory of so foul a thing might be left in the world; nor any might say, behold, this was the tree upon which such a one was hanged."

That thy land be not defiled.] By the stench of the body, after it putrid, as the same Abarbinel explains it, who observes, that the dead body of no creature corrupts and stinks sooner than that of a man, which is exceeding offensive to the living. For which cause, saith he, the book Sephi determine not, only that all malefactors should be buried as soon as the law here orders (that they might not imitate the manners of the Egyptians and Philistines, and such like people, who let bodies rot in the air after they were hung up), but that every man should bury his dead the same day they died, or be deemed to have transgressed a negative precept; which may pass for a very good natural reason of it: but there is something more in it, respecting a legal pollution, under which their whole country lay, as long as an accused thing hung openly among them; just as all that entered into the tent where a dead body lay, and all that was in it, were made unclean by it (Numb. xix. 14, 15). Upon which score St. Paul might well apply this passage to Christ crucified for us, not only because he bare our sins, and was put to death, and exposed to such shame as these sinners were, who were accused of God; but was also taken down in the evening, in token now the guilt was removed; as the curse upon the man that was hanged ended at the going down of the sun: and as the land of Israel was pure and clean, after the dead body was taken down and buried with the tree upon which it was hanged. Joh. Coeh hath well explained this, in his notes upon the Sanhedrin, cap. 6. sect. 5. whose sense in short is this: "As our blessed Saviour, while he hung upon the cross, was made a curse, and an execration; so, when, according to the law, he was taken down and buried, both he ceased to be a curse, and all they that are his."
CHAPTER XXII.

Ver. 1. Thou shalt not see thy brother’s ox or his sheep go astray, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt in any case bring them again unto thy brother. And if thy brother be not nigh unto thee, or if thou know him not, then thou shalt bring it unto thine own house, and it shall be with thee until thy brother seek after it, and thou shalt restore it to him again.

Ver. 3. In like manner shalt thou do with his ass, and with all lost things of thy brother’s, which he hath lost, and thou hast found, shalt thou do likewise: thou mayest not hide thyself. Thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt not see thy brother’s ass or his ox fall down by the way, and hide thyself from them: thou shalt surely help him to lift them up again. The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, neither shall a man put on a woman’s garment: for all that do so are abomination unto the Lord thy God.

Ver. 7. Thou shalt not glean the vintage of thy vineyard, nor gather the grapes of the same: thou shalt leave them for the poor and for the stranger: I am the Lord thy God.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt not denying to him that is fugitive and poor that is within thy gates; I am the Lord thy God.

Ver. 9. Thou shalt not oppress a hired servant who is poor and needy, whether of thy brethren, or of the sojourners which are in thy land within thy gates; I am the Lord thy God.

Ver. 10. If a stranger or an alien dwell among you, in any of your gates which the Lord your God giveth you to inherit, and they desire to cleave unto you; and if any of your children say unto you, What shall I do when I grow old and become poor? Then thou shalt open thine hand wide and shalt impart of thy good to thy brother in need, that he may live with thee. And if a stranger or an alien dwell among you, you shall not do him wrong. For you were strangers in the land of Egypt, and the Lord your God did work great wonders for you in the sight of all Egypt, bringing you out of that land. Therefore you shall remember the Lord your God, and you shall do him good, that he may bless you in all the work of your hands, and that all things may go well with you. For the Lord your God is a merciful God, who will not neglect or forget his covenant and his commandments, which he swore unto your fathers.

Ver. 20. You shall not go into the house of another to take away the garments of any one who is old and feeble, nor enter upon a woman’s bed to commit fornication. You shall not bring the blood of thy neighbor into thy house to be an abomination among you. You shall not commit fornication either by your brother’s wife, or by any other woman. You shall not take a wife in addition to your wife, nor an inheritance in addition to your inheritance. You shall not mix your seed with the seed of another, and you shall not let your daughter marry the son of another. You shall not also bring the blood of your neighbor into your house to be an abomination among you.

Ver. 28. And thou shalt speak in every place where thou dwell; and thou shalt say, ‘I charge thee by the life of the Lord thy God, that thou shalt not do the things which the Lord thy God commandeth thee not to do.’
they be young ones, or eggs, and the dam sitting upon the young, or upon the eggs, thou shalt not take the dam with the young:
7 But thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee; that it may be well with thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days.

8 ¶ When thou buildest a new house, then except soost, to have been given, to breed in the Jews a solemn of a Divine Providence, extending itself to all creatures, and to teach them to exercise their dominion over them without any kind of cruelty.

Thou shalt not take the dam with the young: R. Menaeum, mentioned both by Drusius and Bocharus, was of opinion, that it is not pity towards birds which is intended in this law, but kindness to mankind; whom God intended by this usage of other creatures, to form unto gentleness and commiseration towards one another. But others, I think, have more truly determined, that this is a merciful constitution, with respect to birds as well as men; it being a sufficient affliction, as Maimonides calls it, to the old one to lose her young; it being unreasonable also that men should consider only their own present interest without regard to posterity, to whom the breed ought not to be continued, by letting the old one go. Unto which these verses, commonly ascribed to Phocylides, have respect:

Μηδε της ορισκες γαλος ωμα πατας ιδεται, Μητρα δ' εκπραλακεις, ιδαν τε κενοντι,
i. e. "Let no man take all the birds together out of a nest; but let the mother go, that thou mayest have young ones again of her."

Ver. 7. Thou shalt in any wise let the dam go, and take the young to thee: For there is a great deal of ill-nature in it, to take away the liberty and the life of any creature, from whom we have received a benefit; as Benfrerius glosses upon these words.

That it may be well with thee: Some of the Jews, from these words, have fancied, that the observation of this single precept was of such great value, as to procure for them even forgiveness of sins, and a long life; which is such a foolish conceit, that it makes all other precepts unnecessary. The plain meaning is, that God would reward them for their kind usage even of brute creatures, if other virtues were not wanting, such as charity towards their poor neighbors. And so the Mischna, in the conclusion of the tract called Cholin, discourses very well: "If in a light precept concerning a thing which is scarce worth a farthing, the law says, That it may be well with thee, and thou mayest prolong thy days;" how much more may this be expected in the weightier things of the law?"

Ver. 8. Make a battlement for thy roof: The Jews, I think, are a little too curious, in setting a mark upon the word thy, fancying he saith not simply the roof, but thy roof, to except the temple, and the synagogues, and schools, from this rule; which were no private man's house, but belonged to the whole congregation. They say, indeed, the temple had battlements; but not for necessity, but for ornament, because the roof of the temple was not flat, as the roof of another house was: for nobody walked upon the temple, as they did upon their own houses, to take the air, and discourse together, or to meditate and pray (in little closets they had there), which made it necessary to have these battlements, of three feet and a half high (as the Jews say), to prevent any man's falling down, when he did not attend, but was thinking of some other thing (see Constant L'Empereur, in his Annotations upon the Precepts, p. 160).

That the roofs of their houses were flat, which was the ground of this precept, we have many proofs in the scripture. For either Rahab brought the spies, and covered them with the stalks of flax, which she laid upon them (Josh. ii. 6). Here Samuel communed with Saul, upon the top of the house (1 Sam. ix. 25). David also was walking upon the roof of his palace, when he saw Bath-sheba washing herself (2 Sam. xi. 2). And in the same place Absalom caused a tent to be spread, that he might go in to his father's concubines in the sight of all Israel (xxvi. 22). see also Isa. xx. 3. xxi. 1. and in the New Testament, Acts x. 9. Nor was it the manner of the Hebrews only, but of the Greeks and Romans also, to make the roofs of their houses so that they might walk upon them; and stand there to see any public show, or take the air; as Is. Cassonius shows, in a multitude of instances, lib. iv. in Athenaeum, cap. 12, where he observes also out of Pliny and Seneca, that the Roman houses wanted these battlements, which Moses here ordered in this law. By all which we may easily understand those places in the gospel, that speak of proclaiming these things on the housetop, &c. as L'Empereur observes upon Bavakama, cap. 5.

Ver. 9. Thou shalt not sow thy vineyard with divers seeds: What he had said concerning their fields, Lev. xix. 19, he now says of their vineyards, which they were not to sow with seeds of a diverse kind: for this was an idolatrous custom, as the reason given against it plainly shows. This Maimonides saith he found in a book of the Zabii, and in one rabbi Josiah, who taught, that these three things, wheat, barley, and grapes dried in the sun, should be sown together in the ground with one and the same east of the hand: which was so senseless a thing, that he could not but think they learnt it from the ways of the Americans, as his words are, that is, from the wicked idolaters of the country to which the Israelites were going. For wheat being sown properly at one season of the year, and barley at another, and a vineyard being an improper place for the growth of either of them, this custom could not have its original either from God or from man, but from the devil, the author of confusion, who taught them this unneat rite, in honor of Ceres, perhaps, and Bacchan, whom they joined in the same set of worship.

Lest the fruit of thy seed be defiled: If the Israelites had followed this custom, it would have made both the corn and the grapes that sprung up from such seed impure, because polluted by idolatry; the very smell of which God would not have to remain among 10 ¶ Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together.

11 ¶ Thou shalt not wear a garment of divers sorts, as of woollen and linen together.

12 ¶ Thou shalt make thee fringes upon the four quarters of thy vesture, wherewith thou coverest thyself.

the Israelites, as Maimonides speaks in his More Ne-vochim, par. iii. cap. 37 (see Dr. Spencer, in his very learned work De Leg. Ritual. Hebr. lib. ii. cap. 18).

Every one also knows, that it was unlawful for the Israelites to eat any of the fruits of the earth, till the first-fruits of them had been offered unto the Lord. This would not have been accepted by him of such things as these, that were expressly forbidden by his law; and consequently the whole crop became unclean to them, and might not be used by them.

Ver. 10. Thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together.] Lest that law should be violated which we read Lev. xix. 19, “Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind.” So some give the reason of it; even Maimonides, in the book forereminded, par. iii. cap. 49. But it seems also to have respect to those magical rites of the idolatrous nations in those countries: who thought their fields would be more fruitful, if, according to some directions which had been given by their gods, they were thus ploughed.

For one cannot well think that men, of themselves, would join together two creatures so different in their temper and motions, to draw in the same yoke, if they had not been led to it by some superstition or other. For their strength is unequal, as Aben Ezra here observes, “the strength of an ass is not as the strength of an ox.” Whence it was that Ulysses, to make it be believed that he was mad, joined a horse and an ass to plough; and Homer, Odys. 5. would have oxen ζύγωνα, joined together; that is, ἐνοκάρσα καὶ ἐλκάρσα, “equally bearing and drawing,” as Bochart observes the scholiast there glosses. The Jews commonly think this law extends to all other creatures of different species, which might not be yoked together. But some understand it so, that they might join several kinds together; provided one was the same genus that the other. But Hefner finds this mystery in this preclusion, “That the righteous ought to have no society with the wicked.” And there are those who think the apostle alludes to this, when he saith (2 Cor. vi. 14), Μη γινώσκεις ἐτέραν γυναῖκα ἅπασας, “Be not unequally yoked together with unbelievers” which Bochart himself thinks not improbable (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 13. and cap. 40. p. 401. where there are other reasons of this precept).

Ver. 11.] The ancients think God intended hereby to teach his people simplicity in their manners (see Bochart, in the same book, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 45. p. 491). But there was something farther in it, as I have observed upon Lev. xix. 19. to which I refer the reader. And shall only add here, that the Jews carried this so far, as not to sew a woolen garment with linen thread; nor on the contrary.

Ver. 12. Make thee fringes. What these were, is sufficiently explained upon Numb. xv. 35, 39 (see there).

Upon the four quarters of thy vesture. They were long garments in those countries, as most people do still at this day. And I suppose the garments of the Jews had usually four skirts; but perchance they sometimes had more or fewer than four; and in this case, if they had but three, their doctors have resolved they were not bound to make any fringes for them; but, if they had five or six, they were bound to annex 13 ¶ If any man take a wife, and go in unto her, and hate her.

CHAPTER XXII.

And the damsel’s father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife, and he hath her; and yet these are the tokens of my daughter’s virginity. And they shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city.

And the elders of that city shall take that man and chastise him; and they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel: and she shall be his wife; he may not put her away all his days.

virginity] If the accusation, as they say, was to be made good by witnesses of her adultery, then her defence was to be made, no doubt, by contrary witnesses, who endeavored to disprove the testimony which was brought against her. For so they are constrained to interpret the words we translate “tokens of her virginity;” as I shall show upon ver. 17. The Hebrews have many nice subtilities about the word damsel, with which I shall not trouble the reader (see Selden, in the forenamed place, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1).

Unto the elders] The court consisting of twenty-three judges; who had the cognizance of common, capital, and penal causes, in every city.

In the gate] Where the court sat, as I observed before upon xvi. 18. And this may be added to what I noted there, that by this may be explained those words in the book of Job, v. 1, concerning the children of the wicked, that they are “crushed in the gate,” i.e. lose their cause, and are condemned in the court of judgment, and those of the wise man, Prov. xxii. 22, “Oppress not the afflicted in the gate” i.e. do him justice, and not let him be overthrown, because he wants money to defend his cause. This appears to be the sense from the very next words (ver. 23), “For the Lord will plead their cause,” &c.

Ver. 16. The damsel’s father shall say unto the elders, I gave my daughter unto this man to wife,] The Jews say, the mother had no power to espouse her daughter but the father only, before she was of age. Mischna Sote, cap. 3. sect. 8. Where Wagensell notes, that the mother, and brethren also, had some power in this matter; but such, that the daughter, within a time limited, might make the contract void.

He hath her;] Hath no affliction which a husband ought to have to a wife. If she had no parents alive, she is to appear with him a guardian; and Josephus saith the next of kin were to patronize her, as if they had been her parents.

Ver. 17. He hath given occasion of speech against her.] See ver. 11. He doth not add what there follows, “and brought up an evil name upon her” (i.e. accuses her publicly before you of adultery), because it is sufficiently comprehended in this.

I found not thy daughter a maid;] As such and such give evidence.

These are the tokens] I have good witnesses to the contrary; which are here ready to be produced before the court, to disprove the former testimony.

And they] That is, the witnesses which the father produces.

Shall spread the cloth before the elders of the city.] Though such tokens of virginity, as are commonly understood by these words, might always be found in those countries (being very consonant to the opinion of the chiefest Arabian physicians, as Mr. Selden observes out of Avicenna, and of the Africans and other people at this day, as many authors testify, see Joh. Gen. Nefret Semnus, par. i. cap. 3. and par. ii. cap. 2. and Wiersc L. Medicorum Observationum, sect. II. Hymene), especially in such virgins as the Jews say were here meant, who were under thirteen years of age; and though all that some physicians and lawyers in these parts of the world have said to the contrary is of no consideration; yet there are weighty reasons to incline us to think, that no man of common sense would bring such an action against his wife, wherein he was sure to be cast, whether his cause was right or wrong, if these were the evidences whereby it was to be tried. For if he accused her falsely, he knew her friends were able to produce the sheet wherein they lay when they were married, with such tokens upon it as would disprove him, and render him guilty of defamation. And if he had a just ground to accuse her, because he knew they could not prove the tokens; yet this was no proof she had been vitiated since she was espoused to him: for she might have been corrupted before; and then he could not attain his end, which was to be rid of her, not by way of divorce (for then he must have given her a dowry, which he was desirous to save), but by having her put to death as an adulteress, which ver. 21. shows to be the present case. Such evident reasons as these have constrained the Jews to understand these words, not according to the very letter of them, but figuratively, of such witnesses produced by her parents, as convinced the other of falsity so evidently, that they made it appear as plainly as a piece of cloth that is unfolded, and laid before men’s eyes to view it. And they think the Hebrew word simlah, which we translate the cloth, favors this exposition; for it never signifies a sheet, or linen-cloth, (which is wont to be called sadin, Judg. xiv. 12. Prov. xxxi. 21) but such cloth as men’s garments are made of, which commonly is woollen, not linen. And so it is used in this book, Deut. x. 18. and in this very chapter, ver. 5. So that the sense is “They shall produce evident proofs, and lay them before the court, like a sheet of cloth, that please to look upon it.” Whether this be the truth or not, I will not dispute, but refer the reader to Mr. Selden, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 1, 2.

Ver. 18. The elders of that city shall take that man.] If they were convinced that he had accused his wife falsely, he was to be delivered into the hands of the officers who executed the sentence of the court.

Chastise him;] Condemn him to receive forty stripes save one, as both Josephus and the Talmudists agree; and it was to be done with a scourge made of thongs of an ox’s hide. The woman was dismissed with a solemn benediction; the form of which is set down in the Jewish rituals; and as for the false witnesses against her, they were condemned to be stoned, according to the law, ch. xix. 13, 19.

Ver. 19. And they shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father.] Who was to receive this satisfaction for the reproach which was thrown upon his family. It is something strange that Josephus should mention only παρετέθη αὐτῷ ἀπὸς Ἴδους fifty shekels” to be paid to her father, when the Scripture expressly saith a hundred (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. 8). But it is supposed, by some, that he means fifty paid her dowry, which he was to have given her, if he had put her away; which, that he 20 But if this thing be true, and the tokens of virginity be not found for the damsels:
21 Then they shall bring out the damsels to the door of her father's house, and the men of the city shall stone her with stones that she die: because she hath wrought folly in Israel, to play the whore in her father's house: so shalt thou put evil away from among you.
22 ¶ If a man be found lying with a woman married to an husband, then they shall both of them die, both the man that lay with the woman, and the woman: so shalt thou put away evil from Israel.

23 ¶ If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed might save, he designed to take away her life; and therefore was punished double to what it would have cost him, if he had been so wicked.

Because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin I said the most infamous crime to the charge of an innocent virgin; and that out of hatred to her and love to his money. For if he would have put her away, according to the law of divorce, no man could have hindered him, as Maimonides observes: but then he must have paid her fifty shekels, which they take to be the dowry of virgins, mentioned Exodus, xxii. 16, 17. To keep which to himself, and bear her, as he long he brought this scandalous action against her: for which he was thus justly punished.

She shall be his wife; he may not put her away all his days.] Besides the two former punishments, in his body and his pure, he was deprived of the common benefit which all men had who did not like their wives; which was to sue out a divorce. Here Maimonides calls upon his readers to admire the wise ordination of God, which appears in his judgments, as well as his works. For because this man took away his wife's reputation, therefore God ordered him to be rendered vile, by being whipped: and because he basely contrived to save her dowry of fifty shekels, he ordered him to be amerced as much more: and because he indulged his lust, and sought nothing but his pleasure, therefore he was bound to keep her as long as she lived (More Nevechim, par. iii. cap. 49).

Ver. 20. But if this thing be true.] If the witnesses which appeared for her could not prove the falsity of their testimony who appeared against her.

Ver. 21. Then they shall bring out the damsel to the door of her father's house.] Where she was to be punished, as a disgrace to her parents, who had taken no better care to preserve her chastity while she lived with them.

And the men of the city shall stone her.] This was the punishment of such adulteresses, except only of a priest's daughter, who, if she was guilty of this crime, was burnt alive (Lev. xxi. 19). And it plainly shows he speaks here of a woman corrupted between the time of her espousals and her husband's completing the marriage: otherwise he could not have had this capital action against her, none being put to death for simple fornication. And this Maimonides saith, in Seder Zeraim, that, from Moses to his time, it was never doubted, the woman he here speaks of was one that proved false to her husband after she was contracted to him.

Because she hath wrought folly.] A great wickedness; as the word folly signifies in Scripture, and as the Vulgar translates it.

To play the whore in her father's house.] Where she remained after her espousals, as in a safe place, till her husband brought her home to his own house.

unto an husband, and a man find her in the city, and lie with her;
24 Then shall ye bring them both out unto the gate of that city, and ye shall stone them with stones that they die; the damsel, because she cried not, being in the city; and the man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife: so thou shalt put away evil from among you.
25 ¶ But if a man find a betrothed damsel in the field, and the man force her, and lie with her: then the man only that lay with her shall die:
26 But unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing; there is in the damsel no sin worthy of death:

Put evil away.] See ch. xix. 19.
Ver. 22.] It is not said what death, either here, or Lev. xx. 10. But the Jews say they were to be strangled: which is an opinion so settled among them, that Buxtorf saith he never saw any Hebrew book which assigned any other punishment for adultery but this. Stoning, indeed, was the punishment of her that, after her espousals, played the whore (as was noted before) between that time and her marriage: but after the marriage was completed, if she were guilty of this crime, this was the only punishment, as it is in the Talmud (see upon Lev. xx. 10, and Buxtorf. De Sposital. et Divort. p. 52, 53, and Grotius, in John viii. 5).

Ver. 23. If a damsel that is a virgin be betrothed to an husband;] But not yet known by him: for there was generally some space between the espousals and the bringing her home to her husband's house. And the time allowed was, more or less, according to her age (see to the court of Lib. Hebr. cap. 8).

A man find her in the city, and lie with her;] If the lay with her anywhere else, the crime was the same; but it was not so easy to corrupt her in her father's house, or among her friends, where she remained till the completion of the marriage, as it was to do it abroad in the city, or in the field.

Ver. 24. Ye shall bring them both out unto the gate] This was the place of judgment, which sat there; as I noted upon xvi. 18.

Ye shall stone them.] After they had been sentenced to this death by the court.

The damsel, because she cried not,] Which was a demonstration she was not forced, but lay with him by consent.

Being in the city;] Where the neighbors might have heard her cry; and the force, if there had been any, prevented.

The man, because he hath humbled his neighbour's wife;] For so she was by such a contract, as made her only his. This is supposed to be the case of the woman taken in adultery, mentioned John viii. 5. (see my notes upon Lev. xx. 10).

So thou shalt put away evil.] See ver. 21, 22.

Ver. 25.] If a man find a betrothed damsel in the field,] Where nobody was near, as in the city.

And the man force her.] It was presumed, by the circumstances of the place, that she did not consent, but was under a force; as she also affirmed, and he could not prove the contrary.

Then the man only—shall die.] Because he only was guilty of a crime, as it follows in the next words.

Ver. 26. But unto the damsel thou shalt do nothing.] To make her liable to suffer death: for it was her misfortune, as we speak, not her fault, that she was ravished.

For as when a man riseth against his neighbour,] He not being able to defend himself.
for as when a man riseth against his neighbour, and slayeth him, even so is this matter:

27 For he found her in the field, and the betrothed damsel cried, and there was none to save her.

28 ¶ If a man find a damsel that is a virgin, which is not betrothed, and lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found;

Even so is this matter;] It is here observed by many (particularly by Grotius and De Dieu) that chastity is equal unto life.

Ver. 27. For he found her in the field,] Far distant from all company.

The betrothed damsel cried,] For help, as she affirmed, and as it was presumed; because, if she had consented, some other place might have been found, more convenient for their purpose than the field.

There was none to save her;] None appeared to rescue her, as she desired.

Ver. 28. If a man find—a virgin,] In the field, before mentioned.

Which is not betrothed,] To a husband.

And lay hold on her, and lie with her, and they be found,] There be witnesses of it; or they themselves confess it. This case is different from that in Exod. xxii. 16, 17, in many respects. For that law speaks of one that was drawn in to consent to the man’s lying with her by enticing words (which is expressly there mentioned), and fair promises, perhaps, of marriage; but here Moses speaks of one that “laid hold of her,” i.e. deflowered her by force and violence. In this case the man was bound to marry her, if she and her father pleased (for both their consents were required, though the man that deflowered her could not refuse); but in the former case the man himself might choose whether he would marry or not, which he could not refuse in this; and besides, was bound to pay fifty shekels, as a malum upon him for the crime, as follows in the next verse (see Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 16.)

Ver. 29. Then the—man shall give unto the damsel’s father fifty shekels of silver,] Here is another difference between this case and that in Exodus; where the man was bound to settle a dowry upon her; but here to pay a fine unto her father. The reason is plain; because there was no need of settling a dowry in this case as in the former; for the dowry was settled upon her in that case, lest the husband might lightly and wantonly put her away by divorce, and she have nothing to maintain her; of which there was no danger here, because this law saith expressly, in the conclusion of this verse, that “he may not put her away all his days.” Yet there are those who think it likely, that in this case also he settled a dowry of fifty shekels upon her, besides what he paid to her father; for otherwise the condition of a virgin deflowered by force, was worse than hers deflowered by her own consent.

They have some exceptions concerning this pay-

29 Then the man that lay with her shall give unto the damsel’s father fifty shekels of silver, and she shall be his wife; because he hath humbled her, he may not put her away all his days.

30 ¶ A man shall not take his father’s wife, nor discover his father’s skirt.
CHAPTER XXIII.

1 Who may or may not enter into the congregation. 9 Uncleanliness to be avoided in the host. 15 Of the fugitive servant. 17 Of filthiness. 18 Of abominable sacrifices. 19 Of usury. 21 Of vows. 21 Of trespasses.

1 He that is wounded in the stones, or hath his privy member cut off, shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord.

2 A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to his tenth generation shall he not enter into the congregation of the Lord.

3 An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord.

Ver. 1. He that is wounded in the stones,] bruised or compressed in those parts; as the manner was of making enunciats, who are here spoken of, and were sometimes made that way when they were infants; or by taking them quite away; which was done in some when they were grown up. And there were those who had none of these parts left remaining; as it follows in the next words.

Or hath his privy member cut off[,] In whole, or in part; which was not used till they found the other did not effectually answer their purpose in this unnatural practice. Wherein some thought they honored their gods, particularly Cybele, the mother of the gods, unto whose service her priests devoted themselves by cutting off their genitals. So not only Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and several other of the ancient Christian writers testify, but many also of the pagans (see Joh. Genius De Victorymis Humanis, par. ii. cap. 1).

Shall not enter into the congregation] These persons were so much abhorred by some among the pagans, that Lucian saith they were excluded not only from the schools of philosophers, but which was more, από των έρωτικών, και περιμετρετών, και των κοινών ἀπάτων συλλόγων, "from their holy offices, and their sprinklings, and all common meetings,"

So Dioecles is introduced speaking in his Ennemus. But nobody thinks this to be the meaning here, that they should not entertain such a person as a proselyte; or that he should not come to worship God at the temple; for that was free for all nations if they renounced idolatry. But the meaning of this law is, either to forbid the Israelites to marry with such persons, or not to admit them to hear any office in the Jewish commonwealth. The Hebrew doctors generally take it in the first sense: see Selden, De Juris Nat. et Gent. lib. v. cap. 16. and so do a great many among Christian writers. And there is an eminent example of the use of this phrase in this sense, Neh. xiii. 1—3. But some think it was superfluous to forbid this, because none would marry with such persons as were incapable to perform the marriage duty; and therefore they follow the second sense, it being certain that the Hebrew word kahal, congregation, signifies in many places, not the whole body of the people of Israel, but the great assembly of elders, into which no such person was to be admitted; because they were unfit for government, enunciats being observed generally to want courage. Thus Simeon De Muis, and others, who seem to have great reason on their side. Yet it is so plain that the congregation of the Lord, in the following part of this chapter, signifies the people of Israel, who might not marry with the persons mentioned, ver. 2, 2. 8. that I cannot but think it ought to be so interpreted here. For though such marriages were useless and unpromising, as Malincnides speaks, yet they made a distinction between those who were made enunciats by God (that is, born so) and those made by men:

4 Because they met you not with bread and with water in the way, when ye came forth out of Egypt; and because they hired against them verbosity. And, indeed, some heathens anciently put such a mark of infamy upon mere bastards, as to prohibit both males and females to come to their sacred offices. Such a law there was at Athens, mentioned by Isæus; as Casaubon observes upon Athenæus, lib. vi. cap. 6, p. 410.

There were some also of these mamzers, who were not manifestly born of such incestuous, or other forbidden mixtures, but were called dubious, because their fathers were not known, or being exposed, and found in the fields, or the streets, neither father nor mother was known. Yet it being uncertain whence they were descended, the Israelites might not marry with them, for fear they should be polluted by those who, perhaps, were born of incestuous parents. But proselytes of justice, they say, might marry with mamzers; and that they might not for ever be excluded from the congregation of the Lord, they contrived this remedy for the restitution of their blood. They mingled with them they were disputes (as in the case of a Jew), whose children were not reputed mamzers, but only slaves: who, being made Jews, and having their freedom given them, might lawfully marry with a Jewish woman; and then they were entirely incorporated into the congregation of the Lord: for proles sequitur matrem, "the issue follows the mother" (as that M.N. of Wagenseill hath it, cap. 566), and there was no regard had to father.

Ver. 3. An Ammonite or Moabite shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord; even to their tenth generation] These last words for ever, in this verse, the Jews think warrant them to interpret those words to the tenth generation, in the foregoing verse, as if he said, never. It is certain, indeed, that Moses intended to exclude the Moabites and Ammonites from marrying with the Jews for ever; for so Nehemiah understood him when he quoted this law, xiii. 1, as a reason against the Israelites' marriages with them in his time, when more than ten generations were past. But then these words, for ever, being omitted in the foregoing verse, where he speaks of mamzers, it seems reasonable that they should not be so interpreted; but that, after ten generations were past, all distinction between them and others should be abolished. This, one would have expected, should have been the sense of those who examine every word so nicely as the Jews do: for here being made mention only of an Ammonite and Moabite, that is, of the males of these two nations, they will not have their women concerned in this law: but say, that an Israelite might take one of them to wife, if she embraced their religion. For thus they expound this whole matter of marriages with proselytes of justice; that is, such of other nations as became entirely of the Jews' religion. With such proselytes of some nations, whether men or women, the Israelites were never to make any marriages: with those of some other nations, they were prohibited only to marry with their men: with others, they were prohibited to marry only for some generations: and there were others, with whom they might marry as soon as they were made perfect proselytes. Of the first kind were the seven nations of Canaan, mentioned Deut. vii. 1, with the males or females of which they might never contract an affinity. To the second kind belong the Ammonites and Moabites: to whose males an Israelish woman Balaam the son of Beor of Pethor of Mesopotamia, to curse thee.

5 Nevertheless the Lord thy God would not hearken unto Balaam; but the Lord thy God turned the curse into a blessing unto thee, because the Lord thy God loved thee.

was forbid by this precept to marry: but a man of Israel might marry any of their women, after they professed the Jewish religion; otherwise David, who descended from Ruth, a Moabitess, had been illegitimate. Of the third kind were the Edomites and Egyptians: with whom and with their children, the Israelites might not marry; but their grandchildren might. And of the fourth kind were all other nations besides these mentioned. This is an abridgment of what our great Schenkel hath more largely shown to be the sense of the Jews, in his fifth book De Jure Nat. et Gent. &c. cap. 14, which another excellent person, J. Christoph. Wagenseill hath confirmed, out of his inestimable MS. as he calls Etz-Izachajim, in Hilchoth Nidda, cap. 10 (see Excepr. Gem. in Sota, cap. 1, p. 143).

Ver. 4. Because they met you not with bread and with water] This seems to belong to the Ammonites, who had no compassion towards the Israelites, when they were upon the wilderness, and though they were near of kin to them, did not show them that civility which is commonly expressed to mere strangers in their travels (Gen. xiv. 18. xviii. 2. 31. xix. 1. 2). We do not find any mention of this barbarity of theirs in the foregoing history; but we read how kind God ordered the Israelites to be to them, in not meddling with them, much less distressing them, as they passed by their country (Jer. vi. 19. Which argues that their inhumanity in not vouchsafing this common kindness to the Israelites, of giving them the refreshment of bread and water as they went by them.

Because they hired against thee Balaam] As the foregoing passage peculiarly refers to the Ammonites, so this doth to the Moabites; who, with the assistance of the Midianites, invited Balaam, by the promise of a great reward, to come from the eastern country and curse the Israelites (see Numb. xxii. 5—7). For these two reasons God laid this prohibition upon his people; in which Maimonides observes the Divine justice in proportioning punishments to offences. For Amalek coming out against the Israelites, when they were newly come forth from Egypt, to cut them off with the sword, God commanded their memory to be blotted out (xxx. 19), but the Ammonites being only basely covetous, and the Moabites acting against them only by craft, and not by force, God inflicted no other punishment upon them but this, that his people should avoid all affinity with them, and show no love to them (More Nevechim, par. iii. cap. 41). And the MS. author of Etz-Izachajim, mentioned by Wagenseill, in the place aforesaid, makes this the ground of the distinction mentioned before between the males and females of those countries: "Their males (saith he) might never marry with an Israelish woman; but, by a tradition delivered down to us from Moses in Mount Sinai, we hold, that the women of those countries (if they embraced the Jewish religion) might be married to a man of Israel. For the women must be thought, in all reason, not to have been guilty, as the men were, of that which was the reason of this law, it not being the custom for women to bring out bread and water to travellers; nor did they send ambassadors to hire Balaam to come and curse the Israelites." Accordingly we find Ruth, who was a Moabitess, married to Boaz, the ancestor of David. Ver. 5. Balaam, indeed, did not curse the Israel-6 Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days for ever.

7 ¶ Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite; for he is thy brother; thou shalt not abhor an Egyptian; because thou wast a stranger in his land.

8 The children that are begotten of them shall enter into the congregation of the LORD in their third generation.

9 ¶ When the host goeth forth against thine enemies, then keep thee from every wicked thing.

10 ¶ If there be among you any man, that is not clean by reason of uncleanness that chanceth him by night, then shall he go abroad out of the camp, he shall not come within the camp:

11 But it shall be, when evening cometh on, he shall wash himself with water: and when the sun is down, he shall come into the camp again.

12 ¶ Thou shalt have a place also without the camp, whither thou shalt go forth abroad:

13 And thou shalt have a paddle upon thy weapon; and it shall be, when thou wilt ease all agree, likewise, that none of these laws extended to proselytes, who might marry with any of these nations (see Selden, lib. cap. 18).

Ver. 9. This was a rule to be observed at all times; but then especially, when they had the greatest need of the Divine help (for which wicked people could not reasonably hope), and when there was the greatest danger of being wicked, in a time of such license as soldiers commonly take. There is a sentence very like this in Agathias, lib. ii. (mentioned by Grotius towards the conclusion of his Prolegomena to the book De Jure Belli et Pacis, "Abaxiv yap και οὐκ ἀδέμετραν φρεύδα μι ἢ καὶ σοφία, μάλιστα δὲ ἐν τῷ προσπόλεμῳ καὶ παρατάσσεται. "Injustice and neglect of God's service are ever to be avoided as most pernicious; but especially in a time of war, and when men are upon the point of giving battle." Which he proves elsewhere, by the illustrious examples of Darius, Xerxes, and the Athenians in Sicily.

Ver. 10. If there be among you any man, that is not clean, &c.] This seems to be only one instance of uncleanness, from which they were to keep themselves carefully; though it was no moral impurity, nor a voluntary pollution. By which it was easy for them to understand how watchful they were to be over themselves, in all other cases, especially such as had an inward turpitude in them.

Then shall he go abroad out of the camp.] There is no such thing required before in Lev. xv. 16, where the same pollution is mentioned. The reason, I suppose, was, that he speaks there of what happened to them in their own houses; where they had private chambers, into which they might retire, and keep themselves from defiling others: but here, of those that were abroad in the army, where it was hard to keep their fellow-soldiers from touching them, without removing out of the camp.

He shall not come within the camp:] This some understand, particularly Drusius, of not coming within the camp of God, and of the Levites, that is, to the tabernacle: but it seems to be an exclusion of him from the whole camp of Israel, as I have expounded it.

Ver. 11.] See Lev. xv. 16. The end of all this, as Maimonides observes, More Novochim, par. iii. cap. 61. was, that every man might have this fixed in his mind, that their camp ought to be as the sanctuary of God (into which every one knows no man might enter in his uncleanness), and not like the camps of the gentiles, in which all manner of corruption, filthiness, rapes, thefts, and other wickednesses, were freely committed.

Ver. 12.] A place distant from all company; where they might ease themselves, as it is explained in the next verse. For natural modesty directed all men on such occasions to seek privacy; and it tended, as all cleanliness doth, to the preservation of health: which was one reason of ordering them to find a place without the camp, that there might be no offensive smell.
thyself abroad, thou shalt dig therewith, and shalt turn back and cover that which cometh from thee:

14 For the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp, to deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee; therefore shalt thou among them. And hereby, as Maimonides observes, they were distinguished from brute beasts, which commonly case themselves anywhere, and before any body. But, besides all this, Moses himself gives as the principal reason of this command, peculiarly respecting the Israelites (ver. 14).

Ver. 13. Thou shalt have a pottle.] An instrument wherewith to dig up the ground, and cover it again; Epiphanius, Haeres. xxvii. calls it παῦσαν ἀδειος, "an iron pottle."

Upon thy weapon.] Their sword, I suppose.

When thou wilt ease thyself abroad.] It was not in their choice when they would do this, but when their needs required; yet the Jews will have it, that they were to accustom themselves to do this business in the manner among them, at least Jews at this day (as Leo Modena tells us, in his history of them, par. i. ch. 6), afterward washing their hands, that they may go clean to their prayers.

Thou shalt dig therewith.] A hole in the ground.

Cover that which cometh from thee.] That there might be no appearance nor scent of it remaining. This is still practised by the Caribbeans; among whom there is never any such thing as ordure seen. So the authors of the History of the Caribbee Islands tell us, book ii. ch. 14, where they observe, also, out of Busbequius, that the Turks use the same cleanliness in their camps, making a hole with a piece of iron, wherein they bury their excrements. And in this matter the Esseuses were extremely superstitious: for, as Josephus relates, they would not ease themselves at all on the sabbath-day, because they locked upon it as a labor to dig in the earth, and excrements not fit to be seen on that day.

Ver. 14. For the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of thy camp.] At this time the ark, which was the token of the Divine presence, was settled in the midst of their camp; and, whithersoever they moved, was carried along with them; two standards going before, and two following, soon to ark between them in the midst, as appears from the tenth of Numbers. It is likely, also, that it was carried in aftertimes in the midst of them, when they went to war; as some think it was when they went against the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 6), and when they compass Jericho. Now this presence of God among them was the reason why no uncleanness, though in itself natural, might be found in their camp; but, out of reverence to the Divine Majesty, which dwelt between the cherubims over the ark, be removed afar off. And by such actions as these, Maimonides well observes, God intended to strengthen and confirm the faith of the soldiers, that God, dwelling among them, would go along with them, and fight for them against their enemies, as it here follows, More Neveoeham, par. iii. cap. iv.

And the Arbabine discerns upon these words: "The camps of the Israelites ought to be holy, having a special providence of God among them: for they do not make war by mere human power and courage, but by the power of God and of his Spirit, on which they depend for deliverance from all evil, and victory over their enemies," &c.

To deliver thee, and to give up thine enemies before thee.] This is the constant sense of this phrase, "of God's being in the midst of them," to defend, protect, and deliver them from all evil, as I observed before thy camp be holy: that he see no unclean thing in thee, and turn away from thee.

15 ¶ Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant which is escaped from his master unto thee:

16 He shall dwell with thee, even among you,

(see Deut. vii. 21. Josh. iii. 10. Psal. xlii. 6. Zach. iii. 15.) Now this cleanliness being commanded with respect to the Divine presence, which dwelt among them, the Jews are strangely mistaken in using such superstitions as they do in every place, when they have no such presence of the Divine Majesty in the midst of them (see Schickard in Misch- pat Hammelech, cap 5. This observation is well and right.

Therefore shall thy camp be holy.] Free from all manner of defilements, though they be only of this sort. That he see no unclean thing in thee.] In these words, saith Maimonides (in the place before named), he deters them from fornication; which is far worse than the fornication of the Jews at this day (as Leo Modena tells us, in his history of them, par. i. ch. 6), afterward washing their hands, that they may go clean to their prayers.

And so it is used by the prophet Nahum, iii. 5 (to make no more, where the unhedness of Nineveh, which God saith he would shew to all nations, signifies all the murders, robberies, deceits, and other great wickedness, which abounded in that city (see Uxor. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 23). And thus Abarbinel here extends it to all the horrid sins which were usually committed in the camps of idolaters.

Turn away from thee.] As princes are wont to do, when they see any fault in them. And the meaning is, he would not deliver them from their enemies (as he promised before), but give them up into their hands. I conclude all this matter with the words of R. Zachariais, in Pirke Eliazar, cap. 44, "The pillar of the cloud (in which the glory of the Lord dwelt) encompassed the camps of Israel round about, and made them like a city girt about with a wall, that no enemy might assault them. But this cloud threw all uncleanness out of the camps of Israel, for they were holy:" and he quotes this place for it.

Ver. 15.] The Hebrew doctors understand this of a servant of another nation who was become a Jew. Whom his master, if he went to dwell out of Judea, might not carry along with him against his will; and if he fled from him, when he had carried him, he might not be delivered to him, but suffered to dwell in the land of Israel. Which they understand also of a servant that fled from his master out of any of the countries of the gentiles into the land of Israel; which was to be a safe refuge to him (see Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. juxta Discipl. Hebr. cap. 8, p. 711).

Ver. 16. He shall dwell with thee.] Having embraced the Jewish religion.

In that place which he shall choose.] He was not to be abridged of his liberty, but permitted to settle himself where he pleased, in any part of their country.
in that place which he shall choose in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him.

17 ¶ There shall be no whore of the daugh-

Thou shalt not oppress him.] For there was an express law against all manner of injuries or hardships put upon strangers (Lev. xix. 33, 34).

Ver. 17. If a woman be a whoremonger, or a sodomite, or any whoremonger of the sons of Israel; as the last part of the verse may be translated, with the same reason that the foregoing words are translated, no who're of the daughters of Israel. So Bonfrereius truly observes, and so the Vulgar Latin and the LXX. translate it, and several other versions mentioned by Which sort of persons Moses would not have to be tolerated among the Israelites, as they were among the Egyptians; many of which, if we may believe Nextus women to prostitute themselves, that they looked upon

But as there was no such prohibition, because whereby domestic families are confounded and destroyed (as Maimonides observes); and their issues are looked upon by all men as aliens; so that none will own them as their kindred, and their neighbours become strangers to them; than which nothing can be worse for them, and for their parents. For which cause (saith he) all public stews were dissolved among the Israelites; who had this benefit by it, among others, that many brawls and quarrels, fighings and bloodshed, were prevented; which frequently happened, when several men were assembled at the same time, contending for the same woman. For so the Scripture saith, Jer. v. 7. They assemble by troops in the harlots' houses. For the preventing of these and such-like mischiefs, and that the distinction of families might be preserved, both whores and whoremongers, are here condemned; and no other conjunction permitted, but with a man's own wife, publicly married. For, if a private marriage had been sufficient, many would have kept women in their houses as their whores, and pretended they were their wives. Therefore, after a man had privately espoused a woman, he was bound publicly to keep his wed-ing. Thus that great man, More Nevochim, par.
iii. cap. 49, and see Selden, lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent, juxta Disc. Hebr. cap. 4. p. 554.

How much more abominable then were such persons as prostituted their bodies in honour of Venus and of Priapus, and such-like filthy deities! of which sort there were both males and females consecrated to such impure services! and this practised even in the days of Moses; as appears from the history of those who committed fornication with the daughters of Moab, who exposed themselves in honor of Baal-Peor; for their lying with them was accounted idolatry. And such there were at last among the Israelites, as appears from 1 Kings xiv. 21, 2 Kings xxiii.
where we read, that 'the houses of the sodomites' to whom the daughters of the Lord were given by the phenomenon of the Lord.' Which shows they were not vulgar, but consecrated Sodomites, or whoremongers. I need not mention the heathen writers, who tell us this was a piece of religion among them. See our learned Dr. Spencer, lib.
ii. De Leg. Hebr. Ritual. cap. 25, and Heideggerus, in his Histor. Patriarch, exerect. i. sect, 3, where he observes, a great many very learned men understand this very place, not merely of vulgar whores, but of such as I have mentioned; which were famous in ancient times among the Phenicians, Babylonians, and other nations, whom Strabo calls [eirpovtxov, lib. viii.

Geograph., where he saith (p. 570), that at Corin there was a temple so richly endowed, that it contained πλανήτης εἰς τὴν Ιεροδοτίαν τιταίνας, "above a thousand of these consecrated whores:" whom both men and women had dedicated to the goddess, Ω ταγά ναίσσων ῥηθοῦ ιερονόμου, "for seafaring men (who arrived in great numbers at this port) parted with their money easily." And, lib. xii. speaking of Comana, he saith, there were a multitude of women there, των βαφαγωμάτων από τίνακατο, "who maintained themselves by prostituting their bodies;" and most of them were ἑρμαί "sacred persons": this city being a little Corinth, to which great numbers of people resorted at their festivals, 'διὰ τὸ πλῆθος τῶν τῶν αὐτοῖς ἀπείρων ἰερονομών ἐπταίνην, "because of the multitude of harlots which were here sacred to Vulgar Lat. 'And the Hebrews, by whom we know Athenaeus, lib. xiii. Deipnos. cap. 6, where he saith, that they went to pray there, were wont, for the obtaining their petitions, to add, that they would bring some women to be devoted unto Venus; as Xenophon the Corinthian did, when he returned conqueror from the Olympics.

Ver. 18. Thou shalt not bring the hire of a whore.
If such persons are mentioned in the foregoing verse, offered unto God what they had got by protituting their bodies, it was not to be accepted, but rejected, as abominable. For this was a custom among the idolatrous nations, as appears by a great many of their writers; who tell us, they were wont to dedicate some part of that which they received for the use of their bodies at the temples of their pretended deities. Particularly Herodotus mentions it, as done among the ancient Babylonians, lib. i. p.
199. Which explains what we read in Baruch, vi.
42, 43. where see Grotius's Annotations.

Or the price of a dog:] There was a peculiar reason for this, besides the vileness of this creature (which Maimonides only mentions, More Neverchim, par. iii.
46), which was, as Bochartus, and some other great men think, because a dog was highly honored among the Egyptians, from whom the Israelites were lately come. For the Nile was wont to overflow and enrich their country at the rising of the dog-star, and a dog was the symbol of one of their principal deities, called Anubis, who was represented with a head like that of a dog (see Hieroceleon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 56.
429, &c.). If we can think this vile idolatry was so ancient as the days of Moses, which it is certain prevailed afterward, this may pass for a very likely reason why God would not accept so much as the price for which a dog was sold or exchanged; for so the LXX. expound it: as, for example, if a man gave a lamb for a fine dog, God would not have that lamb offered at his altar; as Maimonides explains it.

For any vow:] There was the greatest obligation laid upon men to make good their vows, whereas; upon any occasion they had bound themselves; but God would have them discharged from such vile obligations as these.

For even both these are abomination unto the Lord:] It is difficult to give an account why these two (the price of a woman and that of a dog) are_rate per the same law; unless it be in opposition to some such rites as those before mentioned among the Egyptians. Who, thy God for any vow: for even both these are abomination unto the Lord thy God.

19 And Lest thou be ensnared by the price of a dog, for though a dog and a dog are both alike impudent. Josephus thinks that the price of a dog here mentioned, was money given, \(i.e.\) \(\text{טָבָן} \text{טַבָּנָה}\), "for the loan of a good dog to breed withal," as Mr. Selden observes in his History of Titiles, p. 57, where he notes, also, that the Jews would not admit the tithes of usury or of war to be offered. But the Talmudists expound it quite otherwise, as I have done, for the price of a dog, either sold or exchanged for some other thing; which the same great man approves of as the true interpretation (lib. v. De Jure Nat. et Gent, cap. 4. p. 537).

Ver. 19. Not lend upon usury to thy brother; \(i.e.\) Unto an Israelite (see Exod. xxii. 25. Lev. xxv. 36).

Usury of money. Here the word nesech is used for all sorts of usury; whether that which was made by the loan of money, called here nesech cesech, or that which was made by the loan of food, and snail-like things, called nesech okel. But, commonly, there are two words used to express this matter, viz. nesech, usury, and tarbirth, which we translate increase. Which are not two kinds of usury, one more griping, the other more moderate, as some have conceived; for the same usury is called nesech with respect to the debt, and tarrith with respect to the creditor, to whom it is beneficial (see Salmassius, in his book De Usuris, cap. 7. p. 188). Yet there is some difference between nesech and tarbirth; else one cannot tell why they are so often both mentioned in the same place. And nesech properly signifies the interest, as we speak, which was paid for money; and tarbirth, the interest of corn, and other fruits of the earth; as the same author shows in that book (cap. 20. p. 614, &c.). And in the next book (De Modo Usuraram) he shows, that, as the LXX. and R. Levi ben Gerson thus understood the difference, so do the ancient fathers, particularly Origen and St. Jerome (cap. 8. p. 320, &c.):

Ver. 20. Unto a stranger One that was not an Israelite, whether he dwell out of the land, or in it; if he were not a proselyte to the law; of whom they might not take any usury, but use him as a brother.

Thou mayest lend upon usury; Some of the Jews would have this to be an affirmative precept, obliging them to make the usury of a gentle, if they lent him any money. For this Maimonides quotes a passage out of Siprius; which others say he mistook. See J. Wagensell, in his Annotationes upon Lipman's Carmen Memorialis, 5. 56, where he shows that he was of this cruel opinion. But this is not the common sense of the Jews, and their wise men have been so modest also as to decree, That though their law did here permit them to take usury of a gentle, yet they were not to practise it, unless it were that they might provide for themselves, that they might live more safely among the gentiles. And they add this reason for this limitation: Lest the Jews by this way of commerce and traffic, should grow too familiar with the gentiles, and learn their manners: only men that studied the law, and thereby were out of danger of being enticed to their religion, might freely lend them money upon usury; for this very end, as they think, that they might make a gain of it, and enrich themselves. See Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent, cap. 10. where he observes, that the Mahometans forbid usury only among themselves, not to strangers. Which Salmasius shows is thus limited in the Aleoran by these words, "in their own territories." That is, if Mahometans live among Christians, they may take usury of them; but of Christians who live among them they may not take any, no more than of a Musulman, as they call themselves.

Unto thy brother thou shalt not lend Upon usury; that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it.

20 Unto a stranger thou mayest lend upon usury; but unto thy brother thou shalt not lend upon usury: that the Lord thy God may bless thee in all that thou settest thine hand to in the land whither thou goest to possess it.
21 ¶ When thou shalt vow a vow unto the Lord thy God, thou shalt not slack to pay it: for the Lord thy God will surely require it of thee; and it would be sin in thee.

22 But if thou shalt forbear to vow, it shall be no sin in thee.

23 That which is gone out of thy lips thou shalt keep and perform; even a freewill offering, according as thou hast vowed unto the Lord thy God, which thou hast promised with thy mouth.

24 ¶ When thou comest into thy neighbour’s vineyard, then thou mayest eat grapes thine fill at thine own pleasure; but thou shalt not put any in thy vessel.
25 When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the therefore might not put any in their pouches, or their garments, or bosoms, or so much as carry away in their hands what they could not eat.
Ver. 25. Thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand] As the disciples of our Saviour did, when they walked through the corn (Matt. xii. 1), which they might have justified by the strictest rules of the ears with thine hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour's standing corn.

Pharisaical doctors, who granted this privilege unto Jews, but not unto gentiles.

But thou shalt not move a sickle They might not cut down any corn, but only pluck with their hands as much as was necessary to satisfy their hunger, or for their pleasure.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Of divorce. 5 A new married man goeth not to war. 6, 10 Of pledges. 7 Of manslaughters. 8 Of leprosy. 14 The hire is to be given.

1 When a man hath taken a wife, and mar-rried her, and it come to pass that she find no favour in his eyes, because he hath found some un潔ness in her; then let him write her a bill of divorce, and give it in her hand, and send her out of his house.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Ver. 1. When a man hath taken a wife, and mar-rried her] The Hebrew doctors make a difference between these two; understanding by "taking a wife," his espousing her to be his wife; and by "marrying her," his completing the contract, by lying with her.

It come to pass] Either after he hath espoused her, or after he hath consummated the marriage.

That she find no favour in his eyes] He dislikes her; or, as it is expressed, ver. 3, hates her. Which signifies either an absolute dislike to her, or comparatively with some person whom he likes better.

Because he hath found some uncleanness in her.] This is assigned as the reason and ground of his dislike, which signifies something odious to him, though perhaps it might not be so to another, whom Moses supposes she might marry after this husband has discharged her. Some of the Jews, indeed, extend this liberty so far, as to fancy they might, without any reason at all, for their mere pleasure, part with their wives (see Buxtorf. De Sponsal et Divortiis, sect. 89).
But others are more modest, and acknowledge that these words ["matter of uncleanness"] signify some weighty cause. Yet they distinguish between the first wife a man took, who might not be put away but for some uncleanness, and the second, who might be put away for a lesser reason. But there were great differences between the school of Hillel and the school of Shammai (whom the Talmudists so much talk of), about this matter of uncleanness: yet both agree it hath a far lower signification here than in the book of Leviticus, where it signifies adultery, incest, or such like turpitude. For if adultery had been here meant, she might have been put to death; or the mere suspicion of it by the water of jealousy (see Buxthinks the two plainest causes of divorce signified by these words, were either such behaviour as might make her suspected of impurity (as going with her face uncovered, or her breast naked; sporting with young men, or washing in the same place with them, or having her arms bare); or, secondly, when they were of such a different temper, humor, and disposition, that they disliked and manseated each other's company, and, consequently, lived in continual brawls and contentions. And, besides such moral causes, they allowed also such natural as made a woman offensive; viz. leprosy, or some such disease in her body as he did not discover before marriage. And sometimes they extend this as far as to a stinking breath.

Let him write her a bill of divorce.] Whatever was the cause of the husband's dislike, this law provides the wife should not be injured by it, being made rather for her advantage than her husband's; viz. to free her (as Dr. Hammond observes) from the pain and vexation of her husband's unkindness, and the danger of seeing another taken in, and preferred before her; and she might be perfectly at liberty to leave one who did not love her, and take another husband who might possibly delight in her (see answer to Six Queries, q. iii. ch. 2). Some think that this custom of putting away wives which they did not like, prevailed before the law of Moses; which opinion hath something to counterbalance it, from the mention of divorces in several places (Lev.
xxi. 14, xxii. 13, Num. xxx. 9) before the book of Deuteronomy was written, wherein he orders a bill to be given in writing to discharge them. If this be true, it gives a good reason why God was pleased to grant this permission; because they were so settled in this practice, that it was safer still to indulge it to them, than quite to abolish it. Which he did with this caution, that husbands should not discharge their wives with a word, biding them to go out of doors (i.e. putting them away rashly, and in a sudden fit of anger), but first write them a bill containing their pleasure herein. When a being a deliberate act, might possibly hinder this divorce; to which they might be prone in a passion, but not after some consideration. The form of this bill is in Mr. Selden, and exactly scanned, lib. iii. Uxor. Hebr.
cap. 21. Who observes also, in another place of that book (cap. 19), that as, for five hundred years or more, the Roman state flourished without the use of divorces, so for seven hundred years after the making of this law, there is no mention of any bill of divorce among the Jews, that is, till the days of Isaiah (see ch. 1. 1), and but rarely afterward.

Give it in her hand.] Saying these, or some such like words, "Behold, this is thy bill of divorce;" otherwise it was not good; and there were to be at least two witnesses unto it, as the Jews say. Who make ten things necessary (which they think to be founded upon the law itself) to make the bill legal (see Selden, in the same book, cap. 25).

Send her out of his house.] This Dr. Hammond (in the place above mentioned) looks upon as an obligation upon her husband to furnish her for her journey, to endow her, and make provision for her. For so the word προσίπρωτα, "to send out," signifies in the

Vol. I.—108
22 And when she is departed out of his house, she may go and be another man's wife.

3 And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement, and give it in her hand, and sendeth her out of his house; or if the latter husband die, which took her to be his wife.

4 Her former husband, which sent her away, may not take her again to be his wife, after she hath been defiled; for that is abomination before the Lord; and thou shalt not cause the land to sin, which the Lord thy God giveth thee for inheritance.

5 ¶ When a man hath taken a new wife, he shall not go out to war, neither shall he be charged with any business: but he shall be free at home one year, and shall cheer up his wife which he hath taken.

New Testament, to provide a visitium, 1 Cor. xvi, 6.

11. Titus iii. 13. where it is explained by “letting nothing be wanting.” But the Jews are of opinion, that the divorce was perfect and legitimate before he sent her out of his doors: for it was sufficient to give her a bill in such a form as plainly showed their marriage was dissolved; and that she was no part of his family, though he had not actually sent her away. Yet if he kept her still in his house, after this bill was delivered into her hand, it was presumed they cohabited together, and he was to give her a new bill of divorcement.

In all which I can see nothing like a command for putting away their wives, if they were disagreeable; which the Jews would fain extort out of these words. And so they spake unto our blessed Lord, Matt. xix. 7. though it were a passage which they only3, &c. took for a permission, Mark x. 3. The plain intent of this law being this; that if a man did put away his wife (as they are suffered to do, she might get another man; but if that new husband died, she might not return to her first husband again. See Buxtorf. De Sponsel et Divortiis, p. 107, 108, &c. and to show that Moses rather supposed than permitted divorces, P. 112.

Ver. 2. When she is departed So that it is publicly known she is no longer his wife.

She may go and be another man's wife. The bond of marriage being wholly broken by the bill of divorcement, whereby he renounced all interest in her, and expressly said, in the very body of the bill (as we speak), “it may be free to thee to marry with whom thou wilt.” Much more w. s. the bond broken by adultery, for which our Saviour gives a man leave to put away his wife, and take another. See David Chytreus concerning this matter, p. 117, &c. where he reports a very wise resolution of Luther's Pomeranus and Melanchthon, in the case of the criminal person.

Ver. 3. And if the latter husband hate her, and write her a bill of divorcement. This shows that no other way of putting away a wife was allowed, but only this. For, as Maimonides well observes (More Nevohim, par. iii. cap. 49) if it had been lawful to do it by bare words, or simply sending her out of his house, any woman might have left her husband, and said she was put away; both she, and he that committed adultery with her, pretending a divorce, when her husband had given her none. Therefore the law wisely provided none should be put away but by such a bill as is before mentioned, whereby an authentic testimony was given of it.

Or if the latter husband die.] Whereby she became free again, as the apostle hath observed, Rom. vii. 2. Ver. 4. Her former husband,—may not take her again.] One would have thought there could have been no danger of any man's desiring her again, whom he had solemnly sent away with dislike. But such is the levity and fickleness of human nature (the Jews at this time were so inconstant), that it seems men sometimes sought after that which they had rejected: and this was the punishment of their injustice, in putting away a wife without sufficient cause (as by this they acknowledged), that they might not again enjoy her.

After that she is defiled] This is the reason why the former husband might not marry her again (as the Jews take it), because by her second marriage she was defiled. Which they say she was (so that he could not have her again), though she had been only espoused to a new husband who had never lain with her. For they make no difference between her second marriage and second espousals, but think a woman contracted such a pollution by her second espousals, that she would not have been so much polluted, if she had played the whore after her divorce. For in that case, they say, she might notwithstanding have married her again; but not after she had been married to another. Thus Mr. Selden reports their opinion, Gen. xxiv. 1. Uxor. Heb. cap. 11, where he observes, that the Maimonides observed it was wrong in many things to ape the Jews, here quite differ from them; allowing a man liberty to take his wife again, though he had divorced her three times.

Now the ground upon which a divorced woman was accounted defiled or unclean, after another man had married her, I suppose, was, that this was looked upon as a sort of renunciation of her former husband on her part, who had been renounced by him by the bill of divorcement; but he was not absolutely renounced by her till she married another, whereby she was totally alienated from him. This made her unclean, not in herself, nor with respect to her second husband, whom she married, nor with respect to any other man (who might marry her without any pollution), but only with respect to her first husband, unto whom, by this law, she was made unclean; for all things forbidden to the Jews were accounted, as appears from Acts x. 14, where all meats prohibited by the law are called unclean; and God is said to have cleansed them, by taking off that prohibition.

For that is abomination] That is, to return to her first husband, and to be his wife again: for this, saith Abarbinel, was to imitate the Egyptians, who changed their wives, and took them again into their houses; which was the occasion of great filthiness. But this intimates, that if she had not been married to any other man, but kept herself free, she might have been his wife again, if he had a mind to be reconciled to her. And this shows also, that God intended to discourage them from putting away their wives, by making them incapable, after they had been married to another, for so many things forbidden to the Jews were accounted, as appears from Acts x. 14, where all meats prohibited by the law are called unclean; and God is said to have cleansed them, by taking off that prohibition.

Thou shalt not cause the land to sin.] The people of the land might, by such a large indulgence, have been tempted to pollute it with many sins, and thereby bring God's judgments upon it (see Jer. iii. 1). For, as Isaac Arama glosses, if this had not been prohibited, a gate had been opened unto vile men, “to make a trade of changing their wives,” and thereby filled the land with whoredoms.

Ver. 5. When a man hath taken a new wife.] The He-6 ¶ No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge; for he taketh a man's life to pledge.
7 If a man be found stealing any of his brethren the children of Israel, and maketh merchandise of him, or selleth him; then that breads think (as I observed before, xx. 7), that, whether he had married a virgin or a widow, he was to have the privilege here mentioned; yea, they extend it to him who had married his brother's wife; but not to him who had married whom he put away, and might take again, if she had not been married since that and to another man. For she could not be said to be a new wife.

He shall not go out to war;] See Deut. xx. 7.
Neither be charged with any business;] No public employment was to be put upon him, which might occasion his absence from his wife; not so much as watching, or such like. For the better understanding of which, it must be remembered, what was said about fearful and timorous, who were bid to return home from the army, lest they disheartened their brethren, xx. 8. And yet these men were bound to furnish the army with victuals and water, to clear the ways, and take up their quarters; but a new bridegroom was free from all these. Only they made a difference between a war by the Divine commandment, and one undertaken voluntarily, and the former of which they think this immunity doth not extend, but only to the latter. In the margin these words are translated, nor any thing pass upon him, that is, he shall not pay tribute.

He shall be free at home one year;] The same time of freedom it was thought reasonable to grant unto builders and planters, because they are joined with new-married men in the speech the priest made before they went to battle, xx. 5—7.

And shall cheer up his wife;] Make much of her, as we speak, and so endear himself to her by his kind- ness, that there might be no occasion of a divorce. For the prevention of which this law seems to have been intended; that by a long conversation togeth- er, without any interruption, they might have so much affection for one another, that the greatest caution might be set down, that he might not easily entertain any jealousies of her, when he should be absent in the wars, or elsewhere.

Ver. 6. No man shall take the nether or the upper millstone to pledge;] This is a law of the same nature with that Exod. xx. 26, 27, for the preservation of mercy, beneficence, and clemency towards the poor, as Maimonides speaks, More Novochim, par. iii. cap. 59.

For he taketh a man's life to pledge.] That is, his livelihood; by which he maintains himself and his family, and keeps them from starv- ing. By this reason it was unlawful to take any other thing for a security, by the want of which a man might be in danger to be undone. For instance, they did not allow any man to seize upon the oxen which were at plough. He who broke this law was scourged.

Ver. 7. If a man be found stealing any of his brethren;] If he were either taken in the fact, or it was plainly proved against him. So the very words of the Athenian law were, ἵνα τις φαράγων γίνηται ἄδελφων διαδοχήμενος, "if a man be an apparent man-stealer.
And maketh merchandise of him.] This was the state of man-stealing, to make a gain of him, either by exchanging him for some commodity, or selling him for money.

Then that thief shall die;] This crime was punished with death, though stealing of beasts or other things was not (see Exod. xxi. 16), because it was very heinous on a double account, both by depriving the community of one of its members, and making him a slave in another country. And, indeed, the most moderate lawyers did not know how to secure men in the possession of things very valuable, but by exacting such a punishment on those that stole them. Thus, after Solomon had tempered the rigid law of Draco, which punished all theft with death, by ordering in most cases only the payment of double, he enacted the stealing of a great sum of money to be capital; nay, he made it a great crime to steal dungs, because it was a thing of great value in that country, which was very barren, and needed it for their ground. How much more valuable was a man in all men's account, whom if any man stole, the law was τριεἴκων ἑαυτόν ἐπι τῆς γυναικας, "that death should be his punishment," as Xenophon reports it. And he was accounted ἀδελφοδικοτητίς, a "man-stealer," who, not only by force or by fraud, carried away a freeman, and sold him for a slave, or suppressed him; but he who inveigled away another man's servant, and persuaded him to run away, or concealed such a fugitive (as Sum. Petitus observes, out of Pollux and others, lib. vii. Leges Atticas, tit. 5, p. 533). Which makes me think not only he that stole "one of his brethren of the children of Israel," but he that stole a pro- lyte of any sort, or a servant of a stranger, was liable to the punishment mentioned in this law of Moses.

Put evil away from among you.] By these words we may understand the greatness of his crime; for they are never used in this book, but when Moses speaks of the punishment of some enormous sin (see xiii. 5, xvii. 7, xix. 19, &c.)

Ver. 8. Take heed in the plague of leprosy;] This was the highest legal uncleanness, and therefore the greatest caution was to be used to prevent its contagion.

Do according to all that the priests] They were constituted by the law the sole judges whether a man had the leprosy or not; and were to order his separa- tion from others if he had; and frequently make in- spection whether it spread, or was at a stand, &c. See the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters of Leviticus; where there are laws about houses and garments, as well as persons infected with this disease by the hand of God, as the Jews understand it.

Shall teach you:] To teach in this place signifies to declare the obligation of the law by the judges of it, the priests the Levites. Thus Jehoshaphat is said to have sent his princes "to teach in the cities of Judah," and with them he sent Levites and priests, 2 Chron. xviii. 18, where it is observed, that in Levitical literature, it is given to the priests how to proceed in judging lepers; but no provision made till now, that the people should stand to their judgment.

They who imagine that the priest had the care of lepers, as their physicians, forget that no other dis-9 Remember what the Lord thy God did unto Miriam by the way, after that ye were come forth out of Egypt.
10 ¶ When thou dost lend thy brother any thing, thou shalt not go into his house to fetch his pledge.
11 Thou shalt stand abroad, and the man to whom thou dost lend shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee.
12 And if the man be poor, thou shalt not sleep with his pledge:

Cursed persons are ordered to repair to them; which is a sign they did not pretend to eure them, but only to preserve others from being defiled by them; and to do what was necessary for their cleansing, when they were healed by God.

So ye shall observe to do.] They were so to observe the priests, as to mark what God commanded; and accordingly obey them, not against, but according to his command.

Ver. 9.] This seems to be mentioned, that they might not think much to be shut up seven days, when they were but suspected to have the leprosy, and seven days more to make farther trial, and to be put out of the camp, when it appeared plainly they had this disease (Lev. xiii. 4, 5, 45, 46), since so great a person as Miriam was excluded so long from the society of God's people (Numb. xii. 15). And this may be looked upon as an admonition to take care, lest they spake evil of dignities (which brought this punishment on Miriam), or disobeyed the commands of the priest, which might bring the like, or some other judgment upon them.

Ver. 10.] This was a very merciful provision for the poor, whose houses he would have so priviledged, that no man might enter into them without their consent, and there choose what he pleased for the security of his debt; but he was to take what the borrower could best spare.

Ver. 11. Stand abroad.] Keep without door.

Shall bring out the pledge abroad unto thee.] So the debtor, not the creditor, was to choose what pledge he would give, for he best knew what he could, with most convenience to himself, part with; and if it was sufficient, the lender had reason to be satisfied with it.

Ver. 12.] But restore it before night, which is to be understood of such things as were necessary for the preservation of his life or health, as the following words demonstrate.

Ver. 13. In any case thou shalt deliver him the pledge again—that he may sleep in his own raiment.] And not be forced to borrow of others a necessary covering to defend him from the cold; and not be able, perhaps, to procure it (see Exod. xxii. 26, 27). Which law seems to have been intended to keep them from taking any pledge of a very poor man. For to what purpose should they every morning fetch a pledge and every evening carry it back again, which would only create them a great deal of trouble!

Bless thee.] Pray God to bless thee.

To shall bring the pledge abroad unto thee.] Procurer thee a blessing from God, who will esteem it an act of great mercy: which is often called by the name of righteousness in the holy books, Ps. cxii. 9. Prov. x. 2, &c. Nay, such-like actions are properly called tzedakah, or righteousness, according to the opinion of Maimonides, who observes (More Nevuchim, par. iii. cap. 32), that this word doth merely signify giving to every man that which is his due when a man pays them for using his wages, or a debtor pays his creditor, that is not called tzedakah; but what a man doth out of pure love to virtue and goodness (as when a man eues a poor wretch of his wounds), is properly called by that name. From whence it is said, concerning the restoring of a poor man's pledge, it shall be to thee for righteousness.'" That is, saith Dr. Hammond (in his Practical Catechism), that degree of mercy which the law required of every Jew, without which he could not be accounted righteous: but there was a degree of bounty beyond this called chasidah, which was an exercise of righteousness or goodness.

Ver. 14. Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant] Either by putting more work upon him than he is able to do, or by detaining his wages when it is done. The latter of these is most properly here denoted, as Const. L'Empeur observes out of D. Kimhi, who in his Book of Roots saith, the difference betweenIFY (which is the word here) and 97 doth not lie in this, that the former signifies to defraud, the latter to take away by violence; but the former signifies to detain by force, and the other to take away by force what belongs to another. And for the proof of it, alleges this place in Deuteronomy, which he thus translates, "Thou shalt not detain by force the wages of the hireling." Which is expressed more clearly, Mal. iii. 5. Annot. in Baye-kanna, cap. 9. sec. 7. p. 217.

That is poor and needy.] And therefore the more to be pitied, and not oppressed, either by giving him less wages than another man, when he ought rather to have greater, or by keeping back his hire beyond the time wherein it ought to be paid: for, as the ancient lawyers say, "Minas solvit, qui tempore minus solvit;" as it is observed by Grotius upon James v.

Whether he be of thy brethren, or of thy strangers] No difference was to be made between a natural Jew and a proselyte of the gate, according to the general law, Lev. xix. 34. For such oppression might tempt them to do very wicked things; for instance, expose or kill their children, when they were not able to maintain them; after the manner of the heathen, who were frequently guilty of this, and thought it no crime when their poverty constrained them to it. See Petrus Petitus, lib. iii. Miscell. Observ. cap. 17, where he produces many proofs of it, both out of Greek and Roman authors.

Ver. 15. At his day thou shalt give him his hire.] Which was due to him, either by contract or by natural equity; and whether he had agreed to serve him for a day, or a month, or a year. At the time when his wages were due, it was to be punctually paid unless he was willing to have it remain in his hands. For this was not an act of mercy, but of justice, to pay a hireling his wages.

Neither shalt thou the sun go down upon it.] This shows he speaks particularly of one that served for a day's wages, and could not forbear the payment of it, because he was so poor as not to be able to provide himself with the means of life without it.

Setteth his heart upon it:] Eagerly expects it, poor, and setteth his heart upon it: lest he cry against thee unto the Lorn, and it be sin unto thee.

16 The fathers shall not be put to death for the children, neither shall the children be put to death for the fathers: every man shall be put to death for his own sin.

17 ¶ Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; nor take the widow's raiment to pledge:

18 But thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in Egypt, and the Lorn thy God redeemed thee, the support of his life. So the Vulgar translates it, "With it he supports his soul," that is, his life.

Lest he cry—unto the Lord.] Make grievous complaints to him who made both rich and poor.

It be sin unto thee.] God will hear his cry, and severely punish thee (see James v. 4).

Ver. 16. This is a rule of common reason, which was anciently expressed in this vulgar saying, Noxa e contrario sequitur; and is excellently expressed by Dion Chrysostom, ἰκασσος αὐτος γίνεται γιὰ ἄδικος αὐτος. "Let every man be the author of his own misfortune." Which Amazia, king of Judah, thought extended to the children of traitors, unto whom he allowed the benefit of this law, as we read in so many words, 2 Kings xiv. 6. 2 Chron. xxv. 4. And not only Philo, but Dionysius Halicarnassaeus condemns the custum of those nations who put to death the children of tyrants or traitors. See Grotius, lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 21. sect. 13, 14, where he observes that God indeed threatens "to visit the sins of the fathers upon the children;" but in this case, Jure dominii non penes utitur, "he uses the right of dominion, not of punishment."

Ver. 17. Thou shalt not pervert the judgment of the stranger, nor of the fatherless; Not of the widow, who is joined with them, ver. 19. For such persons commonly have none to stand by them, and plead their cause; and therefore the judges were to take the greater care to see them have justice done (Exod. xxii. 21. xxiii. 9).

Nor take a widow's raiment to pledge.] Which is to be understood of one that is poor; as appears from very proper examples (Deut. xxiv. 17. 20. 21. 22.

Ver. 18.) The remembrance of their own miserable condition in Egypt, till God took pity upon them, was to work compassion in them towards others in like forlorn estate; otherwise they did not remember as they ought. This is often urged as a reason for showing mercy to strangers, and such-like helpless persons, particularly in Lev. xix. 33, 34, and in this book, x. 19. 20. xxv. 15.

Ver. 19. Hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it.] There are many merciful laws about the poor (see Lev. xix. 9. 10. xxii. 22). They are all put together by Mr. Selden, lib. vi. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6, where the exposition the Talmudists give of this law seems to me to be so strict that it could do little good. For they say a sheaf was not taken to be forgotten, unless not only the owner of the field, but all the laborers forgot it; and if none of them remembered it, yet if any man that passed by that way came and gave them notice of it, it was not looked upon as left by forgetfulness. Yet they are so kind as to extend this law, not only to the sheaves of corn left in the field, but to bunches of grapes, and other fruits, which were left behind in their vineyards or orchards. And it seems no unreasonable interpretation of this law, that if an owner of a field, or his workmen, called to mind, before they deended thee thence: therefore I command thee to do this thing.

19 ¶ When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shal be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow: that the Lorn thy God may bless thee in all the work of thine hands.

20 When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow.

were gone quite out of the field, that a sheaf was left in such a place, they might go back and fetch it; but not, if they did not remember it till they came into the city. They that would see more cases about this matter, may look into Maimonides De Donis Panum, translated by Dr. H. Prideaux (cap. 5), and his very learned annotations upon it. Josephus seems to me to have interpreted this law most charitably, lib. iv. Archelog. cap. 8, where he saith, they were not only not to go back to fetch what they had forgot, but to leave on purpose corn, and grapes, and olives, &c. for the benefit of the poor.

It shall be for the stranger, &c.] Who are commonly put together as proper objects of charity: and are (as Mr. Selden speaks) a kind of paraphrase upon the word poor.

That the Lorn thy God may bless thee.] Make their hand still very fruitful; which was a reward of their charity.

Ver. 20. When thou beatest thine olive tree, As they were wont to do, in those countries, with sticks, to bring down the olives.

Thou shalt not go over the boughs again:] Not search the boughs, after they are beaten, whether any be left.

It shall be for the stranger, &c.] Who might go into the olive-yards, after the owner had carried out his fruit, and gather what they found still remaining on the trees.

Ver. 21. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward:] By making a new gathering after the first. But if the poor themselves left any boughs after the usual time allowed for the gathering such fruits or corn as were left for them, it was lawful for the owner to take it himself; and he was not bound, either to pay the poor the price of it, or to leave it for the beasts and birds. For the command is (say the Jewish doctors, who nicely scan these things), that it shall be for the poor, and that it be left for them; but not any thing given them by the use of it (see Selden, in the fornamed place, p. 699). It shall be for the stranger, &c.] The Jewish doctors by the stranger here mentioned, in this and the foregoing verses, would have only proselytes of justice, understood, who had entirely embraced the Jewish religion: so that other proselytes, and mere gentiles, had no right to these things. For by the law, say they, concerning the tithe for the poor (xvi. 29), the Levite and the stranger are put together: and the Levite being a child of the covenant, so must the stranger be, who is joined with him. But this restriction confined this charity within such narrow bounds, that they themselves are not satisfied with it; and therefore they add, that though such only as were within the covenant had a right to these things by the law, yet if proselytes of the gate, or mere gentiles, mixed themselves with the Jews, by the decree of their wise men, they were not to be hindered from gathering their share in these fruits of the earth which were left for the poor. And they gave this reason for it because of the way of peace, that is, offices of humanity and charity ought to be extended to all (see Selden, p. 709).

Ver. 22.] If they had been only strangers there, and neglected by the natives of the country, the remembrance of God's mercy in providing for them had been a powerful motive to obey this command; and therefore the remembrance of the slavery and grievous oppressions under which they there groaned was a far greater (see ver. 18).

CHAPTER XXV.

1 Stripes must not exceed forty. 4 The ox is not to be muzzled. 5 Of raising seed unto a brother. 11 Of the immodest woman. 13 Of unjust weights.

1 If there be a controversy between men, and they come unto judgment, that the judges may judge them; then they shall justify the righteous, and condemn the wicked.

2 And it shall be, if the wicked man be worthy to be beaten, that the judge shall cause him to lie down, and to be beaten before his face, according to his fault, by a certain number.

3 Forty stripes he may give him, and not exceed: lest, if he should exceed, and beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.

CHAP. XXV.

Ver. 1. If there be a controversy] It is evident, by the sequel, that he speaks of criminal causes.

The judges may judge them;] Who were appointed to be constituted and settled in all their gates (see xvi. 18).

They shall justify the righteous,] Acquit him who is falsely accused of doing any wrong.

Condemn the wicked,] To suffer such punishment as his crime deserves.

Ver. 2. If the wicked man be worthy to be beaten,] For what crimes men were to be beaten, by the sentence of the lower courts, as well as by that of the great Sanhedrin, see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 7. 8. They were in all, as they reckon, two hundred and seven.

The judge shall cause him to lie down,] By his officers who attended the court.

Before his face,] In open court. But he was first to be admonished; and the witnesses were to be produced against him, as in capital causes: after which the judge commanded him to lie down before a low pillar, to which his hands were tied; and he being stripped down to his waist, the executioner stood behind him upon a stone; where he scourged him both on the back and breast, with thongs made of an ox's hide, before the face of the judges: for though one judge be only mentioned, the execution was done before the whole bench, after the sentence was pronounced by one of them.

According to his faults,] For the violation of a negative precept he might be scourged before the court, consisting of three judges; but not for the violation of an affirmative, which was to be done before the court of twenty-three, as Selden observes in the place forenamed, sect. 6.

By a certain number,] He was condemned to receive more or fewer stripes, proportionable to his crime; and all the time the executioner was scourging him, the principal judge proclaimed these words (Deut. xxviii. 54), with a loud voice, "If thou observest not all the words of this law, &c. then the Lord shall make thy plaques wonderful," &c. adding those, xxix. 9, "Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them," &c. Concluding at last with those of the Psalmist, lxxviii. 38, "But he being full of compassion, forgave their iniquities." Which he was to repeat, if he had finished these sayings before the full number of stripes were given (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 13. n. 6, which I find in the title Maccoth, cap. 3. sect. 16, and see G. Schickard, Mischpah Hammenelech, cap. 2. p. 57, 58).

Ver. 3. Forty stripes he may give him,] Which was more merciful than the Athenian law mentioned by Eschines, which was inflicted upon criminals, ἐθημα κακεων πεντεκοτα χλοαν, "fifty stripes by the public scourge." But none among the Jews were to receive above forty for any crime; fewer they might inflict, though not more. But not exceed;] Of this they were so careful, that as one of the three judges commanded the executioner to strike, another told the stripes, while the third pronounced the sentences out of the Scripture before mentioned, to admonish him, and every one else, of the justice of the punishment. So Schickard observes out of Maimonides, in the place above named. For the prevention also of excess in this punishment, they were wont to give but thirty-nine stripes, and no more; though the offender was ever so strong or pertinacious. Thus the Jews generally affirm, and it appears to be true, by what St. Paul said of himself, 2 Cor. xi. 24, "Of the Jews five times I received forty stripes save one;" which is exactly the phrase of Mischa in Maccoth, cap. 3. sect. 10, where they interpret forty stripes for the next number to forty, i. e. thirty-nine. For which they give a foolish reason in the Gemara (as Joh. Cohn there observes); but Maimonides gives a sober account, that this was ordered, lest the executioner, by carelessness, might exceed the number of forty, beyond which the law required them not to go; but it was lawful to fall short of it, and therefore they required him to stop at the thirty-ninth stroke. Yet if any by the decree of this punishment twice together, they did sometimes exceed the number of forty, and went so far as to sentence such a malefactor to receive seventy-nine stripes; as Mr. Selden observes in the same place; where he likewise notes, on the other side, that if a man was so weak, that he was ready to faint away, before he had received thirty-nine, the judges ordered the executioner to stay his hand.

Lest, if he should exceed—then thy brother should seem vile unto thee.] Being beaten like a dog, as we speak; that is, so cruelly, that the marks of it re-4 ¶ Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn.

5 ¶ If brethren dwell together, and one of them die, and have no child, the wife of the dead shall not marry without unto a stranger: her husband's brother shall go in unto her, and take her to him as wife, and perform the duty of an husband's brother unto her.

6 And it shall be, that the firstborn which she beareth, shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead, that his name be not put out of Israel.

7 And if the man like not to take his brother's wife, then let his brother's wife go up to the gate unto the elders, and say, My husband's brother refuseth to raise up unto his brother a name in her.] This was a law before the time of Moses, among the patriarchs, as we learn from Gen. xxviii. 7. 8. &c. And it was so well understood to be a bounden duty, that the Hebrew doctors say, it was not necessary there should be any solemn marriage celebrated with such a widow; because, unless her husband's brother mourned her, she was esteemed his wife, min hashamajim, by the authority of God; and that, whether she had been only espoused by the deceased brother, or his complete wife. Yet by the constitution of their elders, he was to contract with her before two witnesses, and give her a piece of money; before which it was not lawful for him to lie with her. There was to be also a sacred benediction of the marriage; and her dowry assigned her by an instrument. But if he did lie with her before these solemnities, there was no formal contract exacted of him afterward: he was only scourged for continuing the connexion, and some were reproved of God, and the whole was converted into a dowry upon her. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 12, where he observes, that, in case a man left several widows, if his brother either married, or renounced one of them, all the rest were free from this law. And if several brethren died, and left every one of them a wife, without issue, the surviving brother might either take or reject them all; or take two of them, and let the rest alone; and then marry them. And if the best brother, that married his brother's relict, died also without issue, then the next surviving brother was to marry her; and so forward, according to the case supposed in the gospel. And yet that brother only was admitted to this marriage, who was born before his brother's death; which they gather from the first words of this verse, "if brethren dwell together;" which cannot be meant of one born after his brother's death. They might likewise have concluded, from this phrase, that such of the brethren as had wives already were not bound to take her to wife, but only that he was unmarried; who might be supposed to be meant by "him that dwelt together with his brother," and was not yet gone to a house of his own. But I fear I have said too much of a matter now quite antiquated, unless it be among some of the Indians and Persians, and among the Tartars that inhabit Iberia and Albania, who still retain this custom; as Huetius observes, in his Demonstrativo Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 11. n. 1.

Ver. 6. The firstborn which she beareth, shall succeed in the name of his brother which is dead.] Shall be restored the son and heir of the deceased; but there was no necessity to give him his name. That his name be not put out of Israel.] That a family in Israel might not be lost; for this was a provision for the preservation of families (see Numb. xxvii. 4). And therefore, if there was no brother, properly so called, to perform this duty, the next of kin (who is also called a brother in a large sense) was bound to marry her. See of this word name, Numb. xxvii. 4.

Ver. 7. If the man like not to take his brother's wife.] Here now was a great mitigation of that ancient law, which had been before the time of Moses, that a man might refuse to marry his brother's wife, if he did not like her. Which was not permitted before, as ap-
DEUTERONOMY.

Israel, he will not perform the duty of his husband's brother.

8 Then the elders of his city shall call him, and speak unto him; and if he stand to it, and say, I like not to take her;

9 Then shall his brother's wife come unto him in the presence of the elders, and loose his shoe from off his foot, and spit in his face, and shall answer and say, So shall it be done unto that man that will not build up his brother's house.

pears by the story of Onan (Gen. xxxvii.), who married Tamar against his mind (as his behaviour towards her demonstrates), which he needed not to have done, if this permission, which here follows, had been then in use.

Go up to the gate] Where the court of judgment sat, as I have often observed (see xvi. 18).

Unto the elders.] A court consisting of three elders was sufficient to judge in this matter. And it was of no consequence, whether these three were created elders, according to the solemn form among them, by laying on of hands; but it was sufficient, if they were such as they called elders of the street, or common men (see lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 15. and lib. ii. Deut. cap. 7. n. 3).

And say, My husband's brother, &c.] She was to put a bill of complaint against him in these words.

Ver. 8.] He being summoned to appear before them, together with the woman (who they say was to be fasting), and two witnesses at the least, she opened the whole matter. And then the question being asked, whether it were three months since her husband's death (which were to be allowed, to see whether she proved with child or not), and whether this man was next of kin; and a satisfactory answer being returned, the judges laid the law before them, admonished them seriously to consider, on each side, their right, or any disparity or incommodity that might be in their marriage, and accordingly to resolve; and then they asked the man, in express words, whether he would marry her, and raise up seed to his brother. If he stood to his first resolution, as it here follows, and said, "I like not to take her;" then the woman read the words foregoing, ver. 7. "My husband's brother refused to raise up unto his brother a name in Israel," &c., and then proceeded to do as follows, ver. 9 (see Selden, in the book forenamed, cap. 11. n. 5). But he could not be found, and the man said, "I will take her," and the woman asked, "What man?" and he said, "My brother.

Ver. 9. Then shall his brother's wife come unto him and loose his shoe from off his foot.] From his right foot, as the Hebrew doctors say; which was done, I suppose, as a mark of infamy, for his want of natural affection; which made him unworthy to be reckoned among freemen, but rather deserve to be thrust down into the condition of slaves, who were wont to go barefoot.

Spitting his face.] In contempt of him who had despised her. The Hebrew doctors, indeed expounded this only of her spitting upon the earth, directly before his face, so that the spitting might be seen by the judges. And they give this as a reason, why the king was not subject to this law of marrying his brother's wife, (and they might add the high-priest, Lev. xxi. 12, 14), because it would have been below his dignity to have had his shoe pulled off (if he had not liked the woman), or to have had her spit before him, as Bartenora's words are: which would have been a better reason, if they had said, it had been very unbecoming for her to have spit in the king's face. See Selden, lib. i. Uxor. Hebr. cap. 10. and Hackspan, lib. i. Miscellan. cap. 7. n. 8, where he observes, the king was bound to all the six hundred and thirteen precepts, but only this of marrying his brother's wife.

Ver. 10. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed.

Ver. 11. When men strive together] Fall out (as we speak) and fight, either with their fists or sticks, or other weapons.

Of him that smiteth him.] Who had wounded him, and was likely, I suppose, to be too hard for him.

Taketh him by the secrets:] As a sure means to make him let go his hold of her husband, that he might preserve himself.

Ver. 12. Thou shalt cut off her hand.] This was to be done by the sentence of the court, as a punishment for her impudence; and for the hurt which, 13 ¶ Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small.
14 Thou shalt not have in thine house divers measures, a great and a small.
15 But thou shalt have perfect and just weights, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

16 For all that do such things, and all that perhaps, the man might have received hereby in those parts whereby mankind is propagated.

Thine eye shall not pity her.] The word her not being in the Hebrew text, several of the Jews (and Grotesus seems to approve their opinion) interpret this law quite otherwise; as if the woman might both take hold of his secrets for the delivery of her husband, and also cut off the other man's hand; and they should not pity him who suffered thus, nor punish the woman, who might do any thing of this nature, to preserve one so dear to her as her husband: but this is a very forced interpretation. Maimonides is a little more reasonable in his exposition of these words: But let us now signify, that they should lay a fine or a mulct upon her for her immodesty; which is suitable to the interpretation of that law, Exod. xxi. 24, "Eye for eye, tooth for tooth," &c. (see L'Empereur on Bava-kama, p. 198). But it is an intolerable presumption in Maimonides to say, that if any one interpret this of a proper abscission of the woman's hand, though he pretend to be a prophet, and say, The Lord hath said unto me these words, Thou shalt cut off her hand, are to be understood as the words sound (i.e. literally as we speak), and do a miracle to confirm it, he is to be looked upon as a lying prophet, and may be put to death, because it is contrary to the constant tradition of their elders. So he writes Seder Zerain, translated by our famous Dr. Pocock, p. 15, 28. Upon which principle they killed our blessed Saviour.

Ver. 13. Divers weights.] In the Hebrew the words are, a stone and a stone: for their weights were then made of stone, as are ours now commonly of lead or brass.

A great and a small.] To buy in commodities with the merchant, and sell them out again by the small; which was then and is now an usual way of cheating.

Ver. 14. Divers measures.] In the Hebrew, an ephah and an ephah: for this was the most known measure among them, by which all the rest of their measures were made (see Exod. xvi. 36). From hence it was that Lucius Ampelius thought Moschos, that is Moses (who by ancient writers is called Moscheo), was the inventor of weights and measures, because he took such pious care there should be no deceit in them, as the most learned Huetius observes in his Demonst. Evangel. prop. iv. cap. 8, n. 16.

Ver. 15. Thou shalt have a perfect and just weight.] Neither too scanty nor too large. See Lev. xix. 35, 36, where all these three verses are sufficiently explained.

That thy days may be lengthened!] Justice, as well as charity, was necessary to prolong their happiness in the land of promise (xvi. 90).

Ver. 16. For all that do such things.] All that any way wrong their neighbours.

Are an abomination.] This is an expression commonly used, to denote God's hatred of all idolatrous practices (see xviii. 9, 12).

Ver. 17. Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way.] The Jews have framed three precepts out of this and the two following verses. One is, that they do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the Lord thy God.

17 ¶ Remember what Amalek did unto thee by the way, when ye were come forth out of Egypt;

18 How he met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee, when thou wast faint and weary; and he feared not God.

And smote the kindmost of thee.] This he makes the third cause; that they did not offer them a pitched battle, but only fell upon their rear (as we speak), and there cut off such as lagged behind...
19 Therefore it shall be, when the Lord thy God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about, in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance through feebleness and weakness, being unable to march so fast as the rest of their brethren. This is, in a very sober sense, suitable to the use of the word in Josh. x. 19. But what some of the Jews say, that the Amalekites cut off the privy members of certain of the tribes, in their engagements to maintain themselves, is disowned by others of them, as having no foundation. See Schickard, in his Jus Regium, p. 112, 113, where Carpzovius observes, this was only a fancy of their midrashim, or preachers, wherewith they entertained the people in their sermons, on occasion of the ambiguity of the word we translate "cut off the hindermost." Which R. Zacharias much better interprets, in Pirke Eliezer, cap. 44, where he makes it to signify all that were behind the cloud (which protected those who were under it), as those who went out of the camp, by reason of some uncleanness, to wash themselves. But this is no more than an ingenuous conceit; for the laws about cleansing were not then delivered.

And he feared not God. This he makes the fourth cause; that though they feared Israel, whom they durst not look in the face, but cut them off behind, yet they feared not God, who had done such wonderful things for them in Egypt, and brought them thence with a mighty hand, and had overthrown Pharaoh in the Red Sea. Which might have made them understand, that he sets up kings and pulls down kings, as Daniel speaks, ii. 31. But instead of considering this, they would have "profaned the glory of the Lord" (as he speaks), by enslaving those whom he had but newly delivered, and continued under the protection of a glorious cloud. Unto all which may be added, that they were originally derived from the same stock with the Israelites; viz., from the Canaanites.

Ver. 19. God hath given thee rest from all thine enemies round about; God did not require them to put this command in execution immediately after they were possessed of the land of Canaan, but after they were well settled there: so that there were some ages passed before they went about it; and then God himself put them in mind of it; or rather to possess it, that thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven; thou shalt not forget it.

strictly enjoined it to be performed by Saul their first king: and we do not find them blamed for not doing it in the time of the judges (1 Sam. xv. 1—3).

Thou shalt blot out the remembrance of Amalek. So God commandeth Saul in the place now mentioned, "utterly destroy all they have, and spare them not; but slay both men and women," &c. For by the same justice that one person is cut off, a whole family, or a whole nation, may be utterly destroyed: that other families or nations, seeing or hearing God's judgments upon them, may be moved to flee from that wickedness for which they are punished. They are the words of Maimonides, par. iii. More Nevochim, cap. 41.

If we could believe all that the Talmudists say, we might think there were some among the Jews who endeavoured to mollify the severity of this precept: for they tell a story in Bava-bathra of Joab's master, who taught him to read it thus; Blot out secher, the male of Amalek, not secher, the remembrance. But at the same time they tell us, Jeab thought to have killed him for leading him into an error.

Thou shalt not forget it.] This is not a distinct precept, but only a repetition of the foregoing; to imprint it more on their minds and hearts. And accordingly the Jews pretend to have had their hearts so set upon it, that when the officers were about to proclaim freedom from war to those persons mentioned xx. 5, 6, &c., they always excepted the war against the seven nations and Amalek, in which everybody was bound to assist.

I shall end this matter with an observation of Abarbinel, that in this paragraph about Amalek, the injunction which God gave to Moses, Exod. xvii. 14, was fulfilled by him: "Write this for a memorial in a book." No other book, saith he, is hereby meant, but the book of the law, which when Moses wrote, he was bound to mention this precept about Amalek; which he doth in this place. And if we suppose that he immediately wrote a distinct history of this matter, yet he inserted it afterward into the Pentateuch, both here and in the book of Exodus.

CHAPTER XXVI.

1 And it shall be, when thou art come in unto the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee for an inheritance, and possessest it, and dwellest therein;

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 1.] When they had a settled possession of the several inheritances, which fell to their share in the land of Canaan.

Ver. 3. Take of the first of all the fruit of the earth.] This is not meant merely of the first-fruits they should have after they were settled in Canaan, but of the first-fruits they should have every year; which being the most desirable (as Conradus Pellicanus here observes) of all other, and coveted by every one, major aviditate, "with a greater appetite than ordinary."
place which the Lord thy God shall choose to place his name there.

3 And thou shalt go unto the priest that shall be in those days, and say unto him, I opinion is, that they might both bring first-fruits and use the protestation, because Abraham was also the father of strangers (Gen. xvii. 5). And it may be, saith R. Bechaj, that is appointed at ver. 11, of this chapter; where it is said, "Thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you."

Which thou shalt bring of thy land] In order to which, they say, every owner of land, when he went into his ground, and found any figure of grapes, or a pyramide more forward than the rest, he was to tie a rush about it, and write upon it, "These are first-fruits." So Wagenseil, and many others, have observed out of the title Bicerrim, cap. 3.

Put it in a basket.] The quantity of each, they say, was to be at least a sixtieth part. And they might be put into the basket, provided they were not mingled, but preserved distinct; barley being laid at the bottom, and then wheat, and next olives, and above them dates, and then pomegranates; and last of all, figs and grapes, being hung on the outside; and leaves of palm, or other trees, put between every kind of first-fruits.

Bechaj saith, that the rich brought these fruits in baskets of gold and silver, that is, covered with gold or silver (as Maimonides speaks); and we read of the like golden baskets carried by virgins, in the feast of Bacchus at Athens (see Ezek. Spanheimus on Callimachus's hymn to Ceres, p. 733). Now, if the basket here mentioned was made of these, or any other metal, the priest would not have given it to the owner, when he had emptied it: but if it was a wicker-basket, or suchlike, the priest had it together with the first-fruits (see Wagenseil upon Mischna Sota, cap. 7, sect. 3).

And shall go unto the place which the Lord thy God shall choose] The man himself was to go, as the Jews say, with the basket upon his shoulder; and a great company went to go together, when they met at the chief city of their province. The time of going was at the feast of Penteceost (Exod. xxiii. 16), not before but at any time after, till the feast of dedication, which was in our November: after which they were not accepted. Of the manner of going up with a bullock before them, whose horns were girt, and head crowned with an olive garland, with music, and singing in the way the first verse of Psalm xxixii., &c., see Wagenseil, in the place above mentioned; and Selden, lib. iii. De Synedris, cap. 13, n. 3, with Dr. Lightfoot in his Temple Service.

And here I cannot but think fit to note, that the heathen, in all probability, from hence derived the custom of carrying their first-fruits, as a tithe every year, unto a certain Delos, where they thought it best to have his special residence. And this not only from the islands thereabouts, and the neighbouring countries, but from all parts of the world; as the Jews we find everywhere sent, from the countries where they dealt, a sum of money every year, instead of first-fruits and tithes, unto Jerusalem; which privilege the Romans allowed them, after they had conquered them, as Josephus tells us, lib. vii. De Bello Jud, cap. 13. That heathen custom, now mentioned, is expressed by Callimachus, in his hymn upon Delos, in those remarkable words, ver. 278, 279, &c.

proffes this day unto the Lord thy God, that I am come unto the country which the Lord sware unto our fathers for to give us. 4 And the priest shall take the basket out of

The sense of which is this: "That first-fruits were sent for tithes every year from all countries, not only from the east, and west, and south, but from the north also." And they were sent with such joy, as the Jews expressed on this occasion; for all cities, he saith, did χορον αναγιν. And so we read in several authors, that there were δερματα, as they called them, "solemn embassies, and several vessels, by chosen persons, unto Delos, to celebrate there the feast of Apollo with music and dancing, &c. Particularly the Athenians, Peloponnessians, and Messenians, &c., of whom see Ezek. Spanheimus, in his Observations on Callimachus, p. 487. And, which is most strange, the Hyperboreans, a very northerly people, sent frugum primities to this island, as Phylacus saith (see F. M. I know not which author), testifying only what he calls the first-fruits of their corn, and such like things, they call the first-fruits of their holy things; as the same excellent person observes there (p. 490, 492, &c.). Which was done to testify their honour to this god, and for the maintenance of his priests and other ministers, who attended them in the temple, and the Delos, of itself, was but a barren isle, the soil being dry and stony, and called therefore by Callimachus, ver. 208, άδιπροφο

There are other footsteps of this among the heathen; the mystica vannes iacci, mentioned by Virgil in his Georgics, being nothing else (according to Servius) but a leymenum, "a wicker basket," in which their first-fruits were carried (see the same Spanheim, p. 495).

Ver. 3. Go unto the priest] Who was then in attendance at the sanctuary, and particularly appointed to wait for their coming. When they entered the gates of the city, they sang the second verse of Psalm xxixii., "Our feet shall stand in thy gates," and then they went on to the mountains of the temple, and sang the whole hundred and fiftieth Psalm: and as soon as they entered the court of Israel, the Levites began to sing, Ps. xxx. 1, "I will extol thee, O Lord my God," &c.

Say unto him.] The following confession in this verse was made by them with the baskets on their shoulders, to stir them up to humility, as Maimonides interprets it. His words are these: "While they were compelled to carry their baskets on their shoulders, and in that manner to proclaim the Divine benefit, it signified that it was a considerable part of God's worship and service, for a man to be mindful of his afflictions and tribulations, when God had given him ease and rest, and to have this the law of Moses, in several places; as when it saith, 'Thou shalt remember that thou wast a servant,' &c., with this intention, that he who lived in riches and pleasure, might be secured from the vices which spring from thence, such as pride, haughtiness, apostasy, and the like. According to what is said in this book, vii. 13, "Lest thou eat, and art, O Jerusalem, to be thus offered every year to his Divine Majesty" (More Neveochim, par. ii. cap. 39).

I profess this day, &c.] This is a thankful acknowledgment of God's faithfulness to his promise, whereby they were put in mind to be faithful unto him.
of whom they held this good land, by his gracious and free gift, and held it by this tenure, of paying to him this yearly rent.

Ver. 4.] After the foregoing words were said, the basket was taken down from their shoulders, and every one holding his basket by the handle, or the rim of it, the priest put his hands under it, and waved it about, according to the prescription in the law, while they cried, "Hallelujah!" (see Deut. xxvi. 10.) This waving was a manifest token that it was offered to the Lord of the world, as an acknowledgment that he was in a peculiar manner their Lord and Sovereign of whom they held this land.

Ver. 5. Thou shalt speak and say] Audibly pronounce in the presence of God.

Deut. xxvi. 8. The present word, was my father, was not a Syrian by birth, for he was born in the land of Canaan. But one and the same person may be said to be of divers countries (as Bochartus hath observed), with regard either to the place of his nativity, or of his education, or of his life and conversation; which occasioned three countries to be added to our Saviour, viz., Bethel, Nazareth, and Capernaum (see his Phæg, lib. ii. cap. 5). Thus Jacob, who was born and bred in Canaan, is notwithstanding called a Syrian, because he lived twenty years with his uncle Laban, who was a Syrian (Gen. xxv. 20), and consequently Jacob's mother was so, as were both his wives, and all his children, who were born there, except Benjamin. But he is more properly called a Syrian, because of his poverty when he went first into that country, and there lived as a servant, under a hard master; which is expressed in these words, ready to perish, that is, very poor, and reduced to great straits, being forced to flee from the fury of his brother Esau, and to travel on foot to Padan-Aram (which was comprehended, anciently under the name of Syria, Gen. xxxii. 10), where he was so eminently used by his uncle Laban (xxxii. 39—41), that Onkelos takes these words, which we translate ready to perish, in an active sense, for him that destroys another. For by the Syrian here he understands Laban (who is so called, as I noted before, Gen. xxviii. 5), as if the meaning were, the Syrian power (that is, the power of my father). For, as he used him barbarously when he was with him, so he followed after him, when he went away, with a mind to ruin him. And thus Manasseh ben Israel understands it, and many others mentioned by Fessellus, which is the sense also of the Vulgar Latin, Syrus persequebat patrem meum.

He went down into Egypt.] Though he brought him from Laban with great substance, yet as he was still but a sojourner in the land of Canaan, so he was forced by famine to go down into Egypt for sustenance.

Sojourned there with a few.] They were but seventy persons, and lived there as strangers. All which they were now bound to commemorate, for their humiliation before God (which I observed before out of 8 And the Lord brought us forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand, and with an outstretched arm, and with great terribleness, and with signs, and with wonders:

9 And he hath brought us into this place, and hath given us this land, even a land that floweth with milk and honey.

10 And now, behold, I have brought the firstfruits of the land, which thou, O Lord, hast given me. And thou shalt set it before the Lord thy God, and worship before the Lord thy God:

11 And thou shalt rejoice in every good thing of which Maimonides), which might move them the more exalt and magnify the glory of God to him who had made them (as it follows) a mighty nation. For this confession consists of these two parts; their own unworthiness, and God's great goodness.

Became there a nation,] See Exod. i. 7.

Ver. 6.] The goodness of God unto them in making them so numerous, was the occasion of soror affliction than others, and this is a frequent expression (see Exod. i. 9, 10, &c.). The remembrance of this was exceedingly useful, to stir up their gratitude to God, not only for their deliverance from the Egyptian slavery, but bringing them into a country of their own, most plentifully stored with all manner of good things.

Ver. 7.] Having acknowledged their low, and poor, and distressed condition, now they proceed to an acknowledgment of God's wonderful goodness; which appeared the more in relieving them when they were utterly helpless (see Exod. ii. 23—25, iii. 7, 8).

Ver. 8.] See iv. 31, and vii. 19. This is so vehemently inculcated upon them (as Maimonides speaks in the place forenamed), that they should "remember the day they came out of Egypt all the days of their life," xvi. 2; Exod. x. 9. Which it became them especially to remember at this time, that they might demonstrate the truth of prophecy both concerning punishments and rewards.

Ver. 9.] As they remember the terrible plagues upon Egypt in the foregoing verse, so they commemorate the singular blessings bestowed upon them in this.

Ver. 10.] Having brought them into Egypt, and there they concluded this solemn rite, as they began it (ver. 3), with an acknowledgment that they held this land of God as the supreme Lord, and that by his free gift. Set it before the Lord thy God,] Having said these words, they left the basket by the altar, as the Jews say, where it had been placed (ver. 4), and then the priest set it before the sanctuary, where God dwelt by his special presence there.

Worship before the Lord: They made a profound reverence towards the holy place, by bowing their bodies as low as they could, and so went out of the temple; so the Hebrew word imports. And this outward act of worship, no doubt, was accompanied, in all good men, with humble thanks to God for his benefits.}

Ver. 11.] They were to make a feast at the time of offering these first-fruits; and there to entertain the Levites, and the strangers, as well as their own family. These feasts were made out of the provision mentioned, xii. 6, 7, xvi. 10—12. Besides which, the bullock, which went before them when they carried up the first-fruits from the several cities, was offered for a peace-offering, when they came to the sanctuary; as Mr. Selden observes in the place above mentioned (lib. iii. De Synedr. cap. 13, p. 303).

Ver. 12. When thou hast made an end of tithing] For there was a second time to be paid after the first to the Levites, as was observed above, xii. 6, and is which the Lord thy God hath given unto thee, and unto thine house, thou, and the Levite, and the stranger that is among you.

12 ¶ When thou hast made an end of tithing all the tithes of thine increase the third year, which is the year of tithing, and has given it unto the Levite, the stranger, the fatherless, and the widow, that they may eat within thy gates, and be filled; plainly spoken of, xiv. 29, 33, &c. Which the Jews call the "consummation or finishing of tithing," as I observed there, ver. 29. And so these words may be translated, "When thou hast finished all the tithes of thine increase.

The third year, which is the year of tithing.] Every third year, the second tithe before mentioned was to be employed to a peculiar use (see xix. 29, 30), as it follows here in the next words (so the Jews expound it, whose sense our Mr. Mede expresses in a few words). For two years together they paid the Levites' tithe, and the festival tithe; but in the third year they paid the Levites' tithe, and the poor man's tithe; that is, what was wont in other years to be spent in feasting, was wholly spent the next year upon the poor (see i. Diocr. xxii. p. 292). But there are some that think they were bound every third year to pay this poor man's tithe, besides that to the Levites and the festival tithe: about which I shall not here dispute.

Give it unto the Levite, &c.] According to the commandment, xiv. 29 (see there).

Ver. 13.] Then shalt thou say ] As they were every year to make the foregoing profession when they brought their first-fruits, so they were to make another profession, which here follows, every third year; "When the course of all manner of tithing, (as Mr. Mede there expresses it) was come about."

Before the Lord] This sounds as if they were to make this profession before the Lord in the temple, and the sanctuary. Which seems to confute the common exposition of the Jewish doctors, that this tithe of the third year was not to be spent there, but at home, within their own gates. But it may be supposed that every man was privately to make this solemn profession, as in the presence of God, who knew the truth of every man's people. When the Levites went up to worship at God's house, he was bound to make this declaration before the Divine Majesty. Which is the most likely interpretation, because these words, before the Lord, are always so used in these books. And unless they had been obliged to this, their covetous and cruel disposition might have inclined them to defraud the poor, which was prevented. For though men might have satisfied themselves in omitting this profession, if it had been left merely to their own private consciences, yet when they were bound to come and make it publicly at God's own house, as they could not avoid it, so few would be found so impudently profane as solemnly to tell a lie to God himself.

If men separate out of the hallowed things Things separated by the Divine commandment from their own private use, for the use of the poor.

Out of mine house.] From the rest of the fruits of the earth which they had gathered.

Have given them unto the Levite, &c.] That is, unto the refreshment of the poor. So the Jerusalem Targum translates these words to the meaning: "In the third year, which is the year of tithing for the poor, ye shall give the first tithes to the Levites, and then the tithes of the poor to the strangers, fatherless, and widows, that they may eat in their cities, and be filled." According to all thy commandments, &c.] Neither done contrary to God's precepts, nor forgotten to perform them; either by keeping these tithes for themselves, or by bestowing them otherwise than God appointed.

Ver. 14. I have not eaten thereof in my mourning.] After the general profession mentioned in the verse foregoing, that they had brought all hallowed things out of their houses, and employed them as God directed, they were to make three particular professions, which are mentioned in this verse. And it is probable, they were to repeat some idolatrous oaths and promises which were in those days: the first of them is, that they had "not eaten thereof in mourning, or in lamentation." For so the Hebrew word oni signifies, very bitter grief, and sore mourning. Such the Egyptians made in harvest-time, when they offered the first-fruits of the earth, and kept the feast of Isis with dreadful solemnities, and other authors tell us, particularly Julius Firmicus, who severely reproves their folly, or madness rather, saying, Cur plangitis fruges terrae, &c. "Why do you bewail the fruits of the earth? Why weep you at the growth of your seed, &c. You should rather give thanks for these things to the most high God, whose bounty is not to be lamented; but bewail rather your own error," &c. If there was such a custom in the world when Moses lived, it may very well be thought that he taught the Israelites to disclaim such senseless and impious practices. And as the Egyptians, by this mourning, acknowledged Isis, that is, the earth, to be the giver of all these good things; so he required the Israelites, through their hands, to bless the earth, do them joy and thanks unto the Most High: for there was no joy so great as that of harvest and vintage; directly opposite to the heathen, who kept the feast of Bacchus also with lamentations (see our learned Dr. Spencer, lib. ii. De Ritual. Hebr. Leg. cap. 24, sect. 1).

Taken away ought therefor for any unclean use,] As some of the old interpreters were wont to do; who separated some part of the first-fruits for magical purposes, and sometimes for carnal and filthy. So Julius Firmicus informs us, who immediately after the mention of their lamentations, when they gathered the fruits of the earth, asks this question, Quid addis incestum et adulterium! Which shows that there were unclean rites which accompanied their offerings, and that they were the more amiss thereby. See the same learned author in the same place, sect. 3.

Nor given ought therefor for the dead.] If this be the right translation of the last words, for the dead, St. Austin hath given us a likely reason of this clause, which was, to profess they had not imitated the gentiles, who were wont to set meat and drink upon the dead, as Methodius. So Serm. 15, de Sanctis. But it doth not appear that they set any part of their tithe, or first-fruits upon them, not that they did it only in harvest-time; but rather common bread neither have I taken away ought thereof for any unclean use, nor given ought thereof for the dead: but I have hearkened to the voice of the Lord my God, and have done according to all that thou hast commanded me.

15 Look down from thy holy habitation, from heaven, and bless thy people Israel, and the land which thou hast given us, as thou spakest unto our fathers, a land that floweth with milk and honey.

16 ¶ This day the Lord thy God hath commanded and wine, which at all times they set upon their graves when they were interred; and therefore it may be translated to the dead (as the same excellent person observes, sect. 3). And so it is a profession, they had not offered any of the fruits of the earth to heroes (after the manner of the gentiles, particularly to Osiris. For that they honoured them with their first-fruits, appearing by a passage in it. All these verses from 13 to this place, were to be spoken with a low and humble voice, because they are a sort of commendation of themselves, and of their own integrity; which is not to be proclaimed aloud. But when they made the foregoing profession, at the presenting of their first-fruits (ver. 5, 6, &c.), they being an acknowledgment of their own meanness and poor beginnings, and of God's infinite goodness in their advancement, they were to lift up their voice, and say aloud, "My father was a Syrian ready to perish," &c. Thus the doctors resolve in the Gemara of Mischna Sota, cap. 7, in the beginning of it.

Ver. 15. Look down.] Have a gracious regard.

From thy holy habitation.] This is an humble acknowledgment of the infinite majesty of God, which, though he was originally pleased to dwell among them by a glorious symbol of his presence in the sanctuary, yet dwelt in a far more transcendent glory in the heavens, the highest of which could not contain him, as holy men acknowledged (1 Kings viii. 27; 2 Chron. ii. 6).

Bless thy people Israel.] Having performed their duty, they had the greater confidence to beg the continuation of God's mercies to them, and to their country; which it had been presumption to expect, if they had not acknowledged him to be the donor of all the good things they enjoyed in the manner before appointed. For this was the end of all oblations, both of this tithe, and of the first-fruits, and any other, to acknowledge God to be the Lord, "of all the good things come (as David speaks), and of whose own we give unto him" (see 1 Chron. xxii. 11—13, &c.), CHAPTER XXVII.

19 And to make thee high above all nations which he hath made, in praise, and in name, and in honour; and that thou mayest be an you, a people dedicated to his name, as his peculiar, &c. Where Meura, “the Word,” cannot be understood otherwise than of the second person in the Deity.

Ver. 19. To make thee high above all nations.] It is a pious note of Conr. Pelicanus, that there is no greater glory to the faithful, than that they are peculiarly grateful, devoted, dedicated, obedient unto God, as his children.

As from, Israel in name, and in honour.] These words express his singular kindness to them, in that though all nations were his (being made by him, and he the Lord and governor of them all), yet he promised to have such a special favour to them, that all nations round them should take notice of it, and speak with admiration of their happiness, and the honour he had done them. All this is included in those words before mentioned, Exod. xxvii. 5. and the last words of this verse are explained, “That thou mayest be a holy people unto the Lord thy God, as he hath spoken.”

All this Moses called to their mind, that it might prepare and dispose them to renew the same covenant with God before he left them; which he presses upon them in the whole context of this book, after he had given them some other admonitions, and laid before them the blessings and curses that would come upon them, according to their fidelity or falsehood in that holy covenant. Which is the subject of the two following chapters.

CHAPTER XXVII.

1 The people are commanded to write the law upon stones, and to build an altar of whole stones. 11 The curses pronounced on mount Ebal.

3 And Moses with the elders of Israel commanded the people, saying, Keep all the commandments which I command you this day.

2 And it shall be on the day when ye shall pass over Jordan unto the land which the Lord left there, where they lodged that night, which was at Gilgal (see there, ver. 3, 8, 20).

Plaister them with plaister.] That being plain and smooth, they might write what is here commanded upon them, which they could not do while they were rough and uneven.

Ver. 3. Write upon them all the words of this law.] Many think he means the whole book of Deuteronomy; which, because it is long, great stones are ordered to be provided for this purpose. Others think only the ten commandments are here intended, which were the principal “words of the covenant,” as Moses calls this law, xxxix. 1. But Josephus (lib. iv. Archæol. cap. ult.) is of opinion, that he means the verses which here follow from verse 15, to the end of the chapter. Which is no improbable opinion; they containing several select precepts, and the last of them seems to respect the whole law of Moses, ver. 26.

But, however we understand this, it is certain, that, before the use of paper was found out, the ancients, particularly the Phenicians and Egyptians, were wont to write their minds upon stones, as a great many authors testify, mentioned by Huetius, who observes, that this custom continued long after the invention of paper, especially if they desired any thing should be vulgarly known and conveyed down to posterity. See Demonstr. Evang. propos. iv. cap. 2, n. 15, where he observes, that Moses ordered the book of Deuteronomy to be inscribed upon stones. I suppose he means all the laws contained in this book (not all the exhortations and historical passages), which agrees very well with this injunction, that they should write on the stones “all the words of this law.”

When thou art passed over, &c.] When they were grown over Jordan to take possession of the land of Canaan, and were come to the place where he directed these stones to be set up, and this inscription Lord thy God giveth thee, a land that floweth with milk and honey; as the Lord God of thy fathers hath promised thee.

4 Therefore it shall be when ye be gone over Jordan, that ye shall set up these stones, which I command you this day, in mount Ebal, and thou shalt plaster them with plaster.

5 And there shalt thou build an altar unto the Lord thy God, an altar of stones: thou shalt not lift up any iron tool upon them.

made upon them. Which place is particularly named in the next verse. And from these words Fortunatus Sceachus thinks he hath reason to assert, that none of the things forementioned are meant by the words of this law, here commanded to be written; but that upon the very top of these stones (or the altar made of them, as he would have it understood) were written only the words of this covenant, whereby the people of Israel confessed themselves to have received the land of Canaan from God, and to hold it in condition of obedience. And the altar was made of these stones, upon what condition; viz. that thou shouldest keep the commands given to thee by God in Horeb. And therefore Moses doth not bid them write on the stones the law of the Lord nor the law absolutely, but the words of this law. Where the demonstrative particle hath limits the sense to the present matter of which he is speaking. Thus in Exod. 20, 25, chrysm, cap. 57, where he endeavours to strengthen this interpretation, by observing, that, after this command for writing this law upon the stones, "Moses, and the priests, and Levites, spake unto all Israel, saying, Take heed, and hearken, O Israel, this day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God, &c. (ver. 9, 10).

In Mount Ebal. Here the Samaritan Pentateuch hath, "in Mount Gerizim:" which is a manifest corruption, to justify their building a temple there, while they pretend God commanded in these words. Ver. 5. There shalt thou build an altar. That they might offer sacrifice to God, and renew their covenant with him.

An altar of stones. Upon which Josephus himself fancies the forenamed inscription was to be made; and so the Talmudists also, in Mischna Sota, cap. 7. But it is plain, the stones designed for that use were to be set up before the altar was built; the intention of it being (as I shall show presently), that they might promise to observe the words which were there written.

Not lift up any iron tool. See Exod. xx. 25.

Ver. 6. Build the altar—of whole stones.] Not hewn, nor polished; whereby all manner of imagery was avoided. Such rude altars of rough stone, piled one upon another, were in use among the heathen, who seem to have imitated this pattern. The form of one of them Fortunatus Sceachus hath given us out of some ancient monument at Brixia, related by Octavius Roscius (see his forenamed book, cap. 59, p. 553). Such altars the Israelites were permitted to build upon some special occasion, as Gideon and Manoah did (Judg. vi. 24, 26, xiii. 19), and Samuel (1 Sam. vii. 17), and Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 35), and others (2 Sam. xxv. 25), and such an one Moses himself built (Exod. xxiv. 4). And as Moses there set up twelve pillars, according to the number of the tribes of Israel, when they entered into covenant with God at Horeb, so the forementioned author thinks, at the confirmation of it, when they came into Canaan, they built not twelve altars, but heaped up twelve stones, whereon they built one altar without any cause at all bestowed upon it. And thus Elijah took twelve stones, and on a sudden built an altar with them, when he endeavoured to bring the Israelites back again into the covenant of God (1 Kings xviii. 31, 39).

Offer burnt offerings thereon.] As they did at Horeb (Exod. xxiv. 5), and as Joshua did when they came into Canaan, and had built the altar here commanded (Josh. vii. 31), which burnt-offerings were an acknowledgment of God's sovereign dominion over them; and that they held this land of him, as their supreme Lord, from whom they had received it. They kept the passover as soon as they came into Canaan; but we read of no altar erected, nor burnt-offerings offered (Exod. xxiv. 5). Ver. 7. Offer peace offerings.] So Moses also did at Horeb, as we read in the forenamed place (Exod. xxiv. 5), and so Joshua did when they came into Canaan. And they were offered as thanksgivings to God, for bringing them into that good land.

And shalt eat there and rejoice.] The sacrificers had a part both of the peace-offerings given to them, and might feast with God, in joyful communion that they were in covenant with him (see Lev. vii. 5). And therefore God ordered these sacrifices to be offered, as soon as they came to this place, where his law was to be inscribed upon the stones before mentioned: that the people of Israel, to whom God promised the possession of the land of Canaan, upon the condition that they observed his laws, might confirm their covenant with him, when they took possession of it: and be given to understand, that God, having performed what he promised, expected, that they should be mindful of their obligation, faithfully to observe his Divine laws. So that this altar may be properly called (as the same Fort. Sceachus terms it), "the altar of the covenant, into which they had entered at Horeb." Ver. 8.] So that they might be read easily. How the Talmudists came to fancy they were written in seventy languages, I cannot imagine; but such a conceit there is among them, as Mr. Selden observes, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 9, p. 396; for so many languages they think there were in the world, that the Patriarcha said, God would have everybody that came into their country learn these truths, if he pleased; and no pagan be able to excuse his ignorance, by saying, he had no means to know them (see Joh. Wagenseil upon Sota, cap. 7, sect. 5, annot. 5).

Ver. 9. Moses and the priests the Levites spake] hearken, O Israel; this day thou art become the people of the Lord thy God.

10 Thou shalt therefore obey the voice of the Lord thy God, and do his commandments and his statutes, which I command thee this day.

11 ¶ And Moses charged the people the same day, saying,

12 These shall stand upon mount Gerizim to bless the people, when ye are come over Jordan; Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Joseph, and Benjamin:

13 And these shall stand upon mount Ebal to curse; Reuben, Gad, and Asher, and Zebulun, Dan, and Naphthali.

14 ¶ And the Levites shall speak, and say unto all the men of Israel with a loud voice, 15 Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image, an abomination unto the Lord, Mount Gerizim, and then cursed the men of Shechem. Which shows, that the tops of these mountains were not so far distant one from another, but what was said upon the one might be heard by those who were on the top and the sides of the other. And yet there was such a valley between them, that they could not enter within one another at Jordan, upon preceding him, but he had time to die, and get away, after he had spoken his apologue.

Reuben, God, &c.] Four of these were children of the handmaids; and Reuben had lost his dignity by going up to his father's bed; and Zebulun was the youngest of Leah's sons: who was therefore chosen, for this less honorable employment. For otherwise there would not have been an equal number of tribes upon each mountain.

Ver. 14. The Levites] That is, the priests, who are often called "the priests the Levites;" particularly in that very place where we read of the execution of this command, Josh. viii. 33. And the Levites were among those that stood upon Mount Gerizim (ver. 19), who did not pronounce the blessings, but answered Amen to them. Yet the Gemara upon Sota, cap. 7, sect. 23, will have it, that as many of the Levites as were fit to minister, (that is, all from thirty to fifty years of age, who were fit to carry the ark) stood round about the ark with the priests; the rest of the Levites being upon Mount Gerizim, with the other tribes appointed to have their station there.

Shall speak.] The same Gemara rightly gathers, that the ark with the priests were below in the valley between the two mountains; because, it is said, in the place before mentioned, that all Israel and the elders stood about it, Josh. viii. 33. Which could not have been, unless it were placed between the two mountains, for they stood, upon both sides, from the top to the bottom.

With a loud voice.] That every one that stood on the side or top of the mountains might hear what they said, the priests being placed so, in several parts of the valley, that their voice might reach them all. For which end they were advanced, perhaps, upon a pulpit (as Ezra afterward was, Neh. viii. 4), and a signal likewise given when they should say Amen.

Ver. 15. Cursed be the man that maketh any graven or molten image.] The people upon the mountains being to bless as well as curse, the Mishena, in the title Sota, (cap. 7, sect. 5) rightly explains it; that, first, the priests, turning their faces towards Mount Gerizim, proclaimed with a loud voice, "Blessed be the man that maketh not any graven," &c., unto which all the people that stood there answered Amen; and then turning their faces towards Mount Ebal, they said these words, "Cursed be the man that maketh," &c., to which they that stood there made the same answer. See also the Jerusalem Targum, which paraphrases these words in the same manner.

An abomination] Which is odious, and far to be removed from the presence of the Lord, as the same Targum interprets it.

The work of the hands of the craftsmen.] A mere device of men, and therefore not to have Divine worship given to it of any sort.
the work of the hands of the craftsman, and putteth it in a secret place. And all the people shall answer and say, Amen.
16 Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen.
17 Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's landmark. And all the people shall say, Amen.
18 Cursed be he that maketh the blind to wander out of the way. And all the people shall say, Amen.
19 Cursed be he that perverteth the judgment of the stranger, fatherless, and widow.
And all the people shall say, Amen.

Putteth it in a secret place.] Though he was not a public declared worshipper of images, yet, if he did it privately, in some closet of his own house, or in any other secret place, to conceal his wickedness, though he escaped the punishment of the law, which sentented those to be put to death, yet he could not escape the vengeance of God.
All the people.] The forenamed Mischna and Targum say, that the people on both mountains answered
Amen, both to the blessings and to the cursings:
which do not agree with what goes before, ver.
12, 13.
Small answer and say, Amen.] Express their consent to it. For the word Amen, as the Talmudists say in Schebuth, hath sometimes the force of an oath, sometimes only declares consent and approbation, and sometimes is used for the confirmation of any thing. An example of the first they think there is in Numb. v. 23, and they allege this place for an example of the second; and for the third, Jer. xxviii. 6.
Ver. 16. Cursed be he that setteth light by his father or his mother.] It is observed by interpreters, that, as the precept of honouring parents stands next to the commandment concerning the honour that is due to God (Exod. xx. 12), so the curse pronounced against those who dishonoured them is here placed next to the curse against worshippers of images. And as idolaters were to be put to death, so were those that cursed their parents (Exod. xxi. 17; Lev. xx. 9). And I may add, from the foregoing words, that though they did it ever so secretly, they lay under his curse.
The people shall say, Amen.] But before this curse was pronounced, they had said Amen to the blessing opposite to it ("Blessed is he that setteth not light by his father and mother"); as was observed in the foregoing verse. And the same is to be noted concerning the following curses, which were preceded with a blessing, till they were all ended.
Ver. 17.] Against which there is an express precept in the foregoing part of this book, xix. 14. And Pellican well observes, that, by this particular instance of God's displeasure against injustice, they were all encroachments upon their neighbour's possessions.
Ver. 18.] By giving him wrong directions, or misleading him (see Lev. xix. 14). Some apply this to giving pernicious advice to simple people; which is certainly worse than misguiding the blind, because it leads men into sin, as well as into danger.
Ver. 19.] These three I observed before (xxiv. 19), are commonly put together, as a paraphrase on the word poor: whose cause God himself undertakes to plead (x. 18, and see Exod. xii. 21, 22). And, therefore, all good lawyers have taken special care of them, particularly of orphans; concerning whom Plato ordains, that the conservators of the laws should be ἄνευ γενετόρων, "instead of their natural parents"

20 Cursed be he that lieth with his father's wife; because he uncovereth his father's skirt.
And all the people shall say, Amen.
21 Cursed be he that lieth with any manner of beast. And all the people shall say, Amen.
22 Cursed be he that lieth with his sister, the doughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother. And all the people shall say, Amen.
23 Cursed be he that lieth with his mother in law. And all the people shall say, Amen.
24 Cursed be he that smiteth his neighbour secretly. And all the people shall say, Amen.
25 Cursed be he that taketh reward to slay an and look after them so well, that they should not fare the worse for wanting their fathers (see lib. viii. De Legibus, fol. 926, &c., edit. Serrau).
Ver. 20.] See xxii. 30, and Lev. xviii. 8.
Ver. 21.] Exod. xxii. 19, and Lev. xviii. 23. This some of the Jewish doctors, out of an unaccountable pride, conceived to be the vulgar sense of their master (whom they call The people of the earth), as if they were no better than beasts, with whom they were not to marry.
Ver. 22.] This hath been explained also, Lev.
xviii. 9.
Ver. 24.] Though it be with his tongue, whereby he wounds the fame of an absent person.
But the word smile is often used for killing (Exod.
xxi. 12, Lev. xxiv. 17). Of which, if a man was guilty, though he committed the murder so secretly that he could not be put to death by the sentence of the judges, yet he lay under this heavy sentence of God.
Ver. 25.] This seems to have respect to the judges, who for money not only gave wrong judgment in other causes, but condemned those that were not guilty to death (see Exod. xxii. 7, 8, and in this book
x. 17, xvi. 19).
Ver. 26.] The word we here translate confirm, is more plainly translated perform, in 1 Sam. xv. 11.
And so it certainly signifies here, the performing of the holy commandments, being a kind of establishment of the law, as obedience is a subversion of it, and as far as lies in the offender's power, an abolishing it and taking it away. Therefore, the apostle exactly translates the sense of these words, Gal. iii. 10.
"Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things," &c., where the apostle adds the word all (as the LXX. and the Samaritan did, even in St. Jerome's time), to express "the words of this law," to signify not merely all that is contained in these blessings and curses, "but all things which are written in the book of the law." So that whether this whole book (i.e.
all the laws contained in it) were to be written upon the pillars, or only these blessings and cursings, the matter is no different. But there are a number of the latter opinions, that in this book is comprehended in this last curse, all that is contained in the whole law of Moses.
Therefore, it is not very material whether, whether these cursings and blessings were recited upon Mount Gerizim and Ebal, or the whole law of Moses, from one end to the other, about which the Jews them-sewly differ. But that there is of the latter opinion, we think it well grounded upon Jos. viii. 33, where we read how Joshua carefully performed what Moses here enjoined. And, that his words might not be forgotten, Moses seems to have ordered the continuance of this solemnity every seventh year, in the twenty-ninth chapter of this book, ver. 16, 11, &c.
The Mischna in Sota (which I have often mentioned) innocent person. And all the people shall say, Amen.

26 Cursed be he that confirmeth not all the concludes this matter with these words: When the blessings and cursings were ended, they brought stones and built an altar, which they plastered over, and wrote upon them all the words of this law in seventy languages. But I have shown before, that the stones on which the law was written were different from the altar, and were erected before the building of the altar. The Gemara there adds (cap. 7, sect. 24), That every one of the Israelites there present stood bound one for another (that is, for the whole company), that they would observe these laws. Which I know not how they extract out of Moses's words; but their doctors frequently mention it in their books, and make this pious use of it, that, by virtue of this security which they gave for each other, every man was bound to reprove his neighbour if he saw him offend, unless he was content to undergo the punishment which was threatened unto the breach of God's laws, and come under the curse (Lev. xix. 17). And unto this they apply those words, "they shall fall one upon another" (as we truly translate Lev. xxvi. 37), as if they signified, "every one shall fall by his brother," that is, by his brother's crimes: for we all promised, say they (in the Gemara Sanhedrin, cap. 3, sect. 6), and engaged one for another, and so from that time were punished one for another.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

1 The blessings for obedience.

1 And it shall come to pass, if thou shalt hearken diligently unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe and to do all his commandments which I command thee this day, that the Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations of the earth:

2 And all these blessings shall come on thee, and overtake thee, if thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God.

15 The curses for disobedience.

3 Blessed shalt thou be in the city, and blessed shalt thou be in the field.

4 Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy ground, and the fruit of thy cattle, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep.

5 Blessed shall be thy basket and thy store.

CHAP. XXVIII.

Ver. 1. It shall come to pass.] In this chapter he repeats, with many enlargements, the reward and penalties which he had promised and threatened in the book of Leviticals, unto the observance or breach of the covenant they had made with God: and here in this verse he promises in general the blessings which are more particularly enumerated in the following verses.

If thou shalt hearken diligently.] See vii. 12, where the same thing is said; only here he adds the word diligently, to make them attend with the greater seriousness to what he delivered (see ch. xi. 13, 22).

The Lord thy God will set thee on high above all nations.] By bestowing on them the following blessings (see vii. 14). They were already endued with singular privileges above other nations (Exod. xix. 5, 6), which by their obedience would be confirmed, confirmed, and augmented, in greater plenty of all things.

Ver. 2. All these blessings shall come on thee.] Blessings that come unexpectedly, and when we are not in pursuit of them, are most welcome, and highly delight us. And such God here promises to bestow on them by his gracious providence, without their laborious and anxious seeking after them. By which very thing he sets them above all nations: for what they followed after eagerly, and many times in vain, he undertakes should come to them and prevent their desires.

If thou shalt hearken.] So as to observe and do all his commandments; as it is explained in the foregoing verse.

Ver. 3.] That is, in all their affairs, within doors or without. Or whether they lived by employments in the city, or by husbandry in tilling the ground. It is not a natural interpretation of these words, which one of the Hebrew doctors gives of them in Bava Metzia, where he expounds, blessed shalt thou be in the city, Thy house shall be so nigh unto the synagogue, that thou needest not be troubled by going a long way to it; and blessed in the field, Thy ground shall lie so near to the city, that thou mayest quickly bring the fruit it produces to be sold in the market. But if he could have gone on in this manner, it had been something tolerable; but he expounds what follows in a most indecent manner (see Wagenseil upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 3, sect. 9, annot. 5).

Ver. 4. Blessed shall be the fruit of thy body.] This seems to be a promise of preventing miscarriages, when they were with child: for a numerous progeny is promised afterward (ver. 11).

Of thy ground.] This signifies they should have seasonal harvest and vintages. For fruit of the ground comprehends not only all sorts of corn, but grapes, figs, pomegranates, and suchlike fruits which grow on trees.

Of thy cattle.] By the word behema is sometimes meant all sorts of broad creatures, in opposition to men; sometimes tame creatures, in opposition to wild beasts: but here all sorts of domestic creatures (except kine, sheep, and goats), viz. asses and camels. Which Jacob brought with him, as well as oxen and sheep, when he came from Laban into Canaan (Gen. xxxii. 5, 7).

The increase of thy kine.] The breed of these was the most profitable, being a considerable part of the riches not only of that, but of other countries; as appears by what Pausanius saith of them (see Bochartus, par. 1. Hierozioeicon, lib. ii. cap. 40, in the beginning).

The flocks of thy sheep.] Under the name of sheep, in the Hebrew, are comprehended goats also. All which God promises to increase, that is, to make them very wealthy. And here it may be observed, that the Israelites were generally husbandmen or shepherds, and did not commonly follow any other trades: and therefore no mention is made of them here, unless it be in ver. 6, where he seems to speak of all sorts of business.
6 Blessed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and blessed shalt thou be when thou goest out.

7 The Lord shall cause thine enemies that rise up against thee to be smitten before thy face: they shall come out against thee one way, and flee before thee seven ways.

8 The Lord shall command the blessing upon thee in thy storehouses, and in all that thou settest thine hand unto; and he shall bless thee in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

9 The Lord shall establish thee an holy people unto himself, as he hath sworn unto thee, if thou shalt keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, and walk in his ways.

10 And all people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord; and they shall be afraid of thee.

11 And the Lord shall make thee plenteous in goods, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy ground, in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers to give thee.

As he hath sworn unto thee, [See vii. 12.
If thou shalt keep the commandments,] He had separated them from all people, by peculiar laws and privileges: for this purpose, that they should be governed by him, and be obedient to him.

Walk in his ways. Nobody can see any reason to make this a special precept (as the Jews do), that "we should walk as the way led on by the Lord." It contains all the duties owing to him: whether by his ways we understand those Divine qualities, of mercy, holiness, goodness, and truth, whereby we approach to him; or (as the word ways is commonly used in Scripture (his Divine precepts, whereby he comes (as it were) unto us, and declares his mind and will toward us, by conformity to which we become like the people of God in these desiderata: for that is the entire meaning of "walking in his ways;" ordering all our actions, according to the direction of his holy will, whereby we resemble him.

Ver. 10. All people] Who were round about them or should have any knowledge of them.

Shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord.] Be convinced that on the most peculiar manner, the Lord's people, (xiv. 1, xxvi. 18). For wheresoever we read that a person or thing hath the name of God called upon it, or is called by his name, the meaning is, that it is his. As the "city called by God's name," Jer. xxv. 29, is the city of God, where he dwelt, viz. Jerusalem. And thus the ark is said to "be called by the name of God," Num. iv. 13, which was the Lord's ark, or the ark of the covenant. And as here the children of Israel are said to be the people called by his name, so it is of the Christian church, Acts xv. 17. For the very same phrase (as Mr. Mede observes) is used of the like relation that men have unto that which is theirs. Thus Jacob saith, Gen. xlvi. 16, that his name should be called on the two sons of Joseph, that is, they should be his, as Reuben and Simeon were: which shows these are "words of adoption" (see Disc. i. p. 7).

They shall be afraid of thee. Not dare to do thee any hurt, or fear to have thee their enemy.

Ver. 11. Make thee plenteous in goods.] Bestow on them abundance of all good things, that their hearts could desire.

In the fruit of thy body.] By giving them a numerous and healthy issue; whereby they should be multiplied like the stars of heaven, or the sand on the seashore; according to the promise made to Abraham, Gen. xv. 5, xxvii. 17.

Of thy cattle.] Which he promised likewise to increase as long as he continued in the land.

Of thy ground.] Which should afford large crops of corn, and great store of all other fruits every year.

In the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers] So that they should not need to send unto other countries to procure food (as they did in the days of their father Jacob), but have enough in their own land to support them all, though ever so numerous.
12 The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure, the heaven, to give him rain in his season, and to bless all the work of thine hand; and thou shalt lend unto many nations, and thou shalt not borrow.
13 And the Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail; and thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath; if that thou hearken unto the commandments of the Lord thy God, which I command thee this day, to observe and to do them:
14 And thou shalt not go aside from any of the words which I command thee this day, to the right hand, or to the left, to go after other gods to serve them.
15 ¶ But it shall come to pass, if thou wilt not hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to observe to do all his commandments and his statutes which I command thee this day; that all these curses shall come upon thee, and overtake thee:
16 Cursed shalt thou be in the city, and cursed shalt thou be in the field.
17 Cursed shalt thou be thy basket and thy storehouse.
18 Cursed shalt thou be the fruit of thy body, and the fruit of thy land, the increase of thy kine, and the flocks of thy sheep.
19 Cursed shalt thou be when thou comest in, and cursed shalt thou be when thou goest out.
20 The Lord shall send upon thee cursing, vexation, and rebuke, in all that thou settest thine hand unto for to do, until thou be de-

Ver. 12. The Lord shall open unto thee his good treasure.] The heaven, or the air, is called the good treasure of God, because there he gathereth together great heaps of clouds, from whence he enriches the earth with rain. And the showers of rain, which when he withholdeth, he is said to shut up this treasure (xi. 17), and when he bestows it, to open it; that his people might be sensible of their dependence upon his bounty for that blessing, as well as others, which he dispenseth as he pleaseth.
In his season.] The former and the latter rain, as the Scripture calls it. The former fell in autumn, after the seed was sown, to make it take root and spring up; the latter fell in the spring-time, to bring the seed which was come up to maturity (see xi. 14). See the learned Dr. Prideaux, upon Maimonides’s treatise De Donis Pauperum, cap. I, not. 25.
To bless all the work of thine hand.] By these seasonable showers he blessed their ploughing and sowing, and produced a plentiful harvest; which seems to be meant here by the “work of their hand;” viz. their husbandry; which includes all sorts of plantations, as well as tillage (Gen. ix. 20).
Thou shalt lend unto many nations, and—not borrow.] A token of great riches (see xv. 6), which make men bold to be as blessing as they are disposed with piety. And therefore Callimachus, in his hymn to Jove, prays him to bestow both virtue and riches upon them (ver. 97).

Ver. 13. Make thee the head and not the tail.] This is a proverbial speech, which is explained in the words following: “And thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath.” For the head being the first and chief part of all animals, and the tail the last and lowest, those persons are said to be the head who command over others, and those the tail who are subject. And therefore this is a promise that they should rule over other nations, as their lords (as they did in the days of David and Solomon); but other nations should not lord it over them.
If that thou hearken unto the commandments—to observe and to do them.] This was the condition upon which all their happiness depended; as he had told them in the beginning of this discourse, ver. 1.
To go after other gods.] This was the principal commandment of the law, to serve no other gods but the Lord alone. Which, while they observed, he was pleased to bless them, and to bear with many other sins which they committed. Upon which account, this commandment is so often repeated, as we find it, in this very book, vi. 14, vii. 4, 15, viii. 19, ix. 16, 18, xi. 3, 4, 30, xc.
Ver. 15. To observe to do all his commandments.] Especially that great commandment, “Not to go after other gods to serve them.”
All these curses shall come upon thee.] Pursue them so, that they should not possibly escape them. The same phrase is used of the blessings, ver. 2.
Ver. 16.] As many, indeed, as they made them happy (ver. 3).
Ver. 17.] The blessing of the barn was to have it full (ver. 5), and therefore the curse upon it was to make it empty.
Ver. 18.] He threatens to consume their children, their corn, and other fruits, with their herds and flocks.
Ver. 19.] Have no comfort in any undertaking, either at home or abroad, in peace or in war.
Ver. 20. Cursing, vexation, and rebuke.] It is very hard to know what these three words particularly import; the first two of them being very variously translated. The first of them, mecura, seems to signify, in general, that God would blast them in all they desired and vexed and withered them as the earth is with drought; therefore God promises to remove all these things, and to give them health and tranquillity, that they might perfect their obedience, and be worthy of the life of the world to come.
For this is not the end of the law, to make the earth bring forth plentifully, and to prolong men’s life upon the earth, and give them healthful bodies; but that by these things they may be judged and encouraged to perform obedience to it, “k.
Ver. 13. Make thee the head and not the tail.] This is a proverbial speech, which is explained in the words following: “And thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath.” For the head being the first and chief part of all animals, and the tail the stroved, and until thou perish quickly; because of the wickedness of thy doings, whereby thou hast forsaken me.

21 The Lord shall make the pestilence cleave unto thee, until he have consumed thee from off the land, whither thou goest to possess it.

22 The Lord shall smite thee with a consumption, and with a fever, and with an inflammation, and with an extreme burning, and with the sword, and with blasting, and with mildew; and they shall pursue thee until thou perish.

23 And thy heaven that is over thy head shall be brass, and the earth that is under thee shall be iron.

24 The Lord shall bring thee into a land of brooks of waters, and seas, and rivers, that thou hadst not known, and shall bring thee into a land of corn and wine, and oil and honey, and shall bring thee into a land of meats, and shall feed thee, and cause thee to dwell therein with cattle great and small.

25 The Lord shall give thee the mouth of the enemy that speaketh against thee, to make him stumble in his words, and to make thee victorious in his sight.

26 The Lord shall set thine enemies to sing in the dust, and the peoples that he hath made shall praise thee. Ver. 26, 27. 27 The Lord shall make thee the head, and not the tail; thou shalt be above, and they shall be below thee.

28 Ver. 27. The Lord shall cause thee to be worshipped of thy enemies, and thou shalt curse them that curse thee.

29 Ver. 28. The Lord shall make thee a name, which shall be feared among all nations where thou goest.

30 Ver. 29, 31. Thou shalt drive out nations from before thee, and they shall dwell in thy cities which thou shalt forsake, and in the houses of cities which thou shalt found.

31 Ver. 30, 32. Thou shalt reap the increase of thy land, and eat therein securely. Ver. 31.

32 Ver. 32. The Lord shall slay pestilence before thee, and whatsoever plagues in Egypt, which thou knewest not, I will bring upon thee.

33 Ver. 33. The Lord shall make thee a nation as one of the most numerous nations of the earth.

34 Ver. 34. The Lord shall make thee a prosperous nation, if thou wilt only hearken to his voice, and do all that is right. Ver. 34, 35.

35 Ver. 35. The Lord shall make thee to be hated of all nations, as the curse, and as an astonishment, and as an execration, among all nations where thou goest.

36 Ver. 36, 37. Because of all thy wickedness, thou shalt be destroyed, until thou be destroyed.

37 Ver. 37. For thou didst hate the Lord thy God, and goest after other gods, which were not the gods of thy fathers.

38 Ver. 38, 39. Which led thee away, that thou mightest go after them, and thou hast profaned his name in among them. Ver. 38, 39. For the Lord shall bring thee into a land where the seas roar with waves, that cannot be crossed. Ver. 39.

40 Ver. 40, 41. Where the rocks fall upon thee, and where thou shalt not find bread or water; where the winnowing fan shall sweep thee away, and where the sword shall overtake thee. Ver. 40, 41. Ver. 41.

42 Ver. 42, 43. Thou shalt be as a dreamer that dreameth. Ver. 42, 43. And thou shalt see many things, but none of them shall come to pass; and that which thou shalt hear, shall be as the word of a dream. Ver. 43.

44 Ver. 44, 45. And thou shalt be hated of all nations, among whom thou shalt go, because of the Lord, who sent them to drive thee out. Ver. 44, 45. For it is a hidden thing unto thee, to know the manner of all things that shall come to pass. Ver. 45.
24 The Lord shall make the rain of thy land powder and dust: from heaven shall it come down upon thee, until thou be destroyed.

25 The Lord shall cause thee to be smitten before thine enemies: thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them: and shalt be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.

26 And thy carcase shall be meat unto all abundantly, and they should be blessed with healthful seasons, sound bodies, and long life. For it is the very foundation of the law (as his phrase is), to root the forementioned false opinion out of men's minds? (More Neveoch. par. iii. cap. 30).

Ver. 24. Make the rain of thy land powder and dust.] That is, there shall be such a long drought, that, instead of rain, showers of dust, blown up into the air by the wind, shall fall down from heaven upon them. For he is of the opinion that it come down upon thee, but thou be destroyed.) This seems to denote something more than the falling of clouds of dust, wherewith the air was filled by high winds; viz. showers of ashes, which have sometimes fallen in great quantities, as good historians testify. Nothing is more known than the vast clouds of ashes which Mount Etna hath often vomited, whereby all the country thereabout hath been laid desolate. And the like hath been thrown out by Mount Vesuvius, which hath reached as far as Rome and Constantinople (see Bonfrius). But if there was any such thing in Judea, it must be a miraculous judgment, there being no such mountains in those parts of the world, to make such evictions.

Ver. 25. Cause thee to be smitten] He saith the same in effect, Lev. xxvi. 17. For to smile in Scripture (as I have before observed) signifies to slay or kill. Thou shalt go out one way against them, and flee seven ways before them:] Though they marched out in a great body against their enemies, he threatens that they should soon be dispersed; the hand of the Lord at large, as it were, shall be against them. But that expression is remarkable, "the Lord shall cause thee to be smitten" (see ver. 7).

Be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth.] This is something more than is threatened, Lev. xxvi. 33, signifying, not only their dispersion into the remotest parts of the world, but their being tossed up and down like the sands of the seashore, in any certain settlement; which had been notoriously verified since their last dispersion by the Romans, of which they themselves have given us large accounts in several books, viz. Juchasin, Schalscheleth Hakabala, Schebet Judah, and Zemueh David, wherein they have abundantly confirmed what Tertullian saith of them in his time, Dispersi, palabund, erudit, soli sui exteriores vagantur per orbem; "that being scattered, straggling up and down uncertainly, banished from their own country, they wander about the world, without any king, &c. But this belongs to the time of the first captivity, when Nehemiah (ch. i. 8) confesses these words were fulfilled (see Jer. ix. 16; Ezek. vi. 8, xii. 14, 15).

Ver. 26. Thy carcase shall be meat unto all the fowls of the air, and unto the beasts] Nothing was accounted a greater calamity among the Jews, than to have their dead bodies lie exposed, to be buried only in the bowels of birds and beasts; and therefore Jeremiah threatens this as the utmost punishment of the king of Babylon, xxix. 19, 30, and the Psalmist beholds it as one of the sorest judgments that was befallen them, Ps. lxxix. 2, 3.

No man shall fray them away.] That is, no man took so much compassion upon them as to chase them away, and to inter the remains, which the birds and beasts hath not devoured.

Ver. 27. The Lord shall smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with the emerods, and with the scab, and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed.

28 The Lord shall smite thee with madness, and blindness, and astonishment of heart: 29 And thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness, and thou shalt not prosper in thy ways: and thou shalt be only oppressed and spoiled evermore, and no man shall save thee.

30 Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her: thou shalt build an house, and thou shalt not dwell therein: thou shalt plant a vineyard, and shalt not gather the grapes thereof.

always brought great calamities upon them, as R. Gedaliah himself confesses in Schalseleth Hakka-bim (see the learned Wagenseil's conflation of R. Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 233, &c.). Unto which I shall add only one observation made by Virgil in the thirtieth Eclogue. In the places of Germany, they were possessed with such a rabies, that they cut one another's throats, to avoid the oppression of their enemies; and burnt themselves and their neighbours in their houses, setting whole cities on fire, and perishing in the flames. Such were their extreme rage and furious revenge against those Christians who pressed them to change their religion. Many stories of the like nature that author tells in his book entitled Schebet Judah; where he hath sixty-four relations of the calamities which befell them in that and in other countries. But these words I doubt not, were fulfilled before in the first desolation of Jerusalem, to which they belonged. For though we have not such particular relations as those now mentioned, there is the prophet's evidence of this, and that of their being mad, by drinking of the cup of the Lord's fury (Jer. xxv. 16, 18), and blind (Zeph. i. 17; Lam. iv. 14), and astonished (Jer. iv. 9; Ezek. iv. 17).

Ver. 29. Thou shalt grope at noonday, as the blind gropeth in darkness.] This shows the blindness spoken of in the foregoing verse, relating to the mind, which was so darkened, that in the plainest and clearest things they mistook the way and means of their preservation (Zeph. i. 17).

Thou shalt not prosper in thy ways.] But, quite contrary, whatsoever course they took, it turned to their undoing.

No man shall save thee.] This was so remarkably fulfilled in those parts of the world, that the magisterates who had so much in many places to preserve them from such outrages, as none but Jews can justify, durst not venture to appear for their rescue. And those that did take them into their protection, were the instruments of their further wrongs, by grievous exactions for the maintenance of the war undertaken in their defence. So strangely (as that excellent person, by the foregoing verse, tells us), that to this day, the Moors, in the habit of spoiling, used by God to bring that to pass, which his servant Moses had foretold in this verse, no man shall save thee: for even succour itself turned into their sorrow; and it is hard to say, whether men's purposes for their good, or for their evil, brought greater plagues upon them. Thus it was before their first captivity; Pharaoh king of Egypt came to help them, but was not able (Jer. xxxvii. 7, xlv. 17).

31 Thine ox shall be slain before thine eyes, and thou shalt not eat thereof: thine ass shall be violently taken away from before thy face, and shall not be restored to thee: thy sheep shall be given unto thine enemies, and thou shalt have none to rescue them.

32 Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people, and thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them all the day.

Ver. 30. Thou shalt betroth a wife, and another man shall lie with her.] Take her away from thee before thou canst condone the marriage. This was a sore affliction, for all nations accounted it a singular blessing to complete a marriage; and, on the contrary, a curse to be defaced of such delightful hopes. Whence Callimachus, in his hymn to Apollo, promising many blessings to the youths who sung and danced before his altar, mentions this in the first place (ver. 14).

El relato mildones rapide

"that he would be with them, and prosper them, if they were to be married."

Thou shalt build an house, and— not dwell therein. But another take possession of it (Zeph. i. 13).

Thou shalt plant a vineyard near the grapes.] So we rightly translate the Hebrew word, which (as the margin notes) is, thou shalt not procure or make common the grapes thereof; which was not to be done till the fifth year after the plantation. Before which time God threatens another should enter into it, and enjoy the fruits thereof.

Ver. 31.] All these are but particular instances of their grudging kindness in all countries, where their goods have been confiscated, the bills of debts owing to them all cancelled. Of which the same pious and learned person, Dr. Jackson, gives several instances in the forenamed chapter.

Ver. 32. Thy sons and thy daughters shall be given unto another people.] This was literally fulfilled when the Jews were banished out of Portugal, in the time of king Emanuel; who ordered their children under nineteen years of age to be taken from them, and brought up in the Christian religion. When infants also were torn from their mothers' breasts, with far more grief and sorrow than they had at their coming out of their womb: and many hundreds years before that, when the Moors were in a violent war against Spain, suffering no parents to have any commerce with their children after the seventh year of their age, but by public decree they were committed to Christians to be educated by them, who married them to their own sons and daughters (see the same Dr. Jackson, ch. 28, parag. 1, 2).

Thine eyes shall look, and fail with longing for them. Their women filling the heavens with more hideous shrieks than the Egyptians did, when all their first-born were slain in the night. For these were bereft at once of all their dear children in the open sun, in vain begging to have them restored to them. And to increase their calamity (as that excellent person observes, ch. 29, par. 15), many Moors professing Mahometan sects, were transported out of Portugal at the same time, without such violence offered to them. What was the reason (saith he)? God would have a manifest distinction made between the Jews and other people, that this prophecy might be fulfilled. There shall be no might in thine hand.] Either to protect or to rescue them from their enemies, which was not but a mighty deed, with the same doctor, that the Moors then had some power in their hand, which 35 The Lord shall smite thee in the knees, and in the legs, with a sore botch that cannot be healed, from the sole of thy foot unto the top of thy head.

Ver. 33. The fruit of thy land—shall a nation which thou knowest not eat up.] This was remarkably fulfilled, when Salmaneser came and despoissied the ten tribes; and when Nebuchadnezzar carried away the other two tribes and placed other people in their room. There were many strange people also among the Romans, who devoured their labours, before their last destruction by Titus. And ever since they have been subject to deprivations of various sorts; having scraped up riches, with great care, which have often fallen into the hands of strangers. Particularly in the time of the famous crusades, when divers nations marched in great numbers to recover the Holy Land from infidels, their business was in their way to rob and spoil the Jews, and to make great slaughter of them, as both Jewish and Christian writers witness; particularly the author of Schalscheleth Hakakabala, and our Matthew Paris.

Only oppressed and crushed alway.] That they should not only be oppressed, but in some ages, or in some one or few kingdoms, but always, in every kingdom whither they removed (as he speaks, ver. 35), suffer such violence and wrong, as no other people hath done, must needs be thought to proceed rather from Divine justice than men's inclination to injustice. Which could not but have varied with the diversity of times and places, and the disposition of the particular persons, among whom they have been dispersed. And yet the brief enumeration of their particular spoils and hard usage, which Dr. Jackson makes in the forenamed chapter (whose words these are, in the beginning of it), throughout the most civil and best governed states of Europe, will abundantly confirm the truth of Moses's words in this place, "Thou shalt never but suffer wrong and violence alway," as our old translation hath it. The same is lately observed by an eminent learned person (J. Wagenseil), in his confession of R. Lipman's Carn. Memoriale, p. 211, where he takes notice, that the Jews no sooner have grown rich, and by degrees become considerable in any country, but some great calamity hath befallen them. This the attentive consideration of their history will justify, particularly as he observes in France, Spain, and England; God not suffering them to be quite destroyed, like the Amalekites, Jebusites, and Philistines, of whom no footsteps remain, but be scattered and tossed about through all Christian countries (for a testimony to the truth of our religion), and there only oppressed, crushed, and squeezed, as Moses here foretold. One instance of which sore oppression I cannot forbear to add out of Schebet Judah, where R. Solomon Virge confesses what great miseries they have been exposed unto, by persons pretending to be their Messiahs, who have drawn the hatred of all nations upon them; particularly in Persia, he saith, they were most lamentably handled upon this score, being not only stripped of all, but forced to go about like dogs with a great clog of wood bound to their necks, which exposed them to the scorn and laughter of all men; for while some threw it behind their backs, some threw it down before their feet; some dragging them backwards, and others cruelly beating them with it. This one told him who saw it.

Ver. 31.] So they were (as the forenamed doctor observes, ch. 29, par. 6, 15), when their children were taken from them in Portugal. For some, being not able to rescue or despatch them, killed themselves; others, who had the opportunity, drowned their children in wells or ditches. And here in England, one of their learned rabbins persuaded four hundred of his company, besieged with him in a strong tower by the furious multitude, to eat their own throats, rather than fall into their enemies' hands; himself confirming his doctrine, by cutting his wife's throat first, then his children's, and lastly, killing himself. And thus, in the time of the forerenominated crusades, the soldiers made such dreadful havoc of the Jews as they went along to the Holy Land, that many of them made themselves away out of despair; as their own authors, R. Gedaliah and David Ganz, tell us, ad an. 1096.

Ver. 35. This is the same word in the Hebrew [seebe'hekin] which is used ver. 27, called the "botch of Egypt," and here "an evil botch," that is, a very grievous breaking out; which began in those lower parts, and so spread, (being incurable, and by no means to be stopped) from the sole of the feet, unto the crown of the head.

Ver. 36. This shall bring thee—unto a nation which neither thou nor thy fathers have known.] This may seem to have been fulfilled literally, only when Jehoiachim was carried away captive to Babylon (2 Kings xxiv. 15), and afterward Zedekiah (xxv. 7; Jer. xxxix. 7, 9, 11). For when they returned, they had no more any kings. But the latter part of these words ["a nation which neither thy fathers have known"] may incline us to extend their threatening as far as to their last dispersion by the Romans. Since which they have been driven into several countries far less known to them than Babylon was (with which they had correspondence before their captivity thither, 2 Kings xx. 12, &c.), and though they have had no king, yet they have erect of their own governors, who may be comprehended under that name.

There shall thou serve other gods.] Either sot-} is tishally following the example of the country to which they were carried (Jer. xlv. 17, 18), or being compelled thereunto by their cruel tyranny (Dan. iii. 6). The author of Schebet Judah observes, that this was the just punishment of their folly in running after idols, that they were sent into other countries to worship those gods which they were so fond of in their own. And he refers it particularly to the time of the captivity of Babylon; in which they continued seventy years, according to the number of years wherein those planets, whom they had worshipped, finished their course: for Saturn, as he computes.

proverb, and a byword, among all nations whither the Lord shall lead thee.

38 Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in: for the locust shall consume it.

finishes his in one-and-twenty, Jupiter in as many; and so he proceeds with the rest, which make up that number. But this is too curious an observation, and the Jews have little skill in astronomy; therefore I pass it by, and only observe, that Manasseh ben Israel also understands this of the Babylonian captivity; for all the punishments mentioned, from ver. 15 to ver. 38, were fulfilled under the first temple, and after the ruin of it, till the building of the second; which, though it be not exactly true (some of these predictions having been more completely fulfilled, as I have shown in aftertimes), yet is it reasonable to think that this threatening particularly belongs to what they suffered in Babylon: the very same calamities being again threatened in the sixty-fourth verse, where I shall show it belongs to their present condition.

Ver. 37. Become an astonishment. Their neighbours, he means, who saw or heard of the greatness and strangeness of their various plagues, should be dismayed at the sight, or report of them; wondering that a people, who had been so flourishing, should be made so exceeding desolate (see 1 Kings ix. 8; Jer. xviii. 16, xix. 8).

A proverb, and a byword.] So that when men would express one extremely vile, they should say he was a Jew. The same is threatened by God when he appeared to Solomon, 1 Kings ix. 7, and by Jeremiah, chap. ii. 10, 11, in which it is likely was fulfilled, in their first captivity into Babylon (see Lam. ii. 15, 16); but hath been notoriously fulfilled in their last captivity (as they call it) since the destruction of Jerusalem and their temple by the Romans: for here in England (from whence they have been banished above three hundred years) their name serves as a perfect measure (to use the words of Dr. Jackson, before on the same subject, 20), to shew the height of impiety in any agent, or the death of an abject, worthless, forlorn condition, in any patient. Better we cannot express the most cut-throat dealing than thus, "You use me like a Jew?" or, "none but a Jew would have done this." And when in common speech we exaggerate wrongs done to the most odious or despised people among us, we say, "I would not have done so to a Jew." Ver. 38. Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shalt gather but little in.] This was fulfilled before they were carried captive to Babylon, when God frequently sent sore famine upon them, as we read in the prophet Isaiah, lii. 19, and Jeremiah, xiv. 1—3, &c., and is often threatened by Ezekiel among manner tempests, and judgments, and by Jeremiah himself, xxix. 17, 18.

For the locust shall consume it.] They were a great plague in those countries, falling sometimes in such vast numbers (from whence they had the name of arbe), that they covered the whole face of the earth, and devoured every green thing: so for another of their name tempests, which is chasal, coming from chasal, which signifies to consume and eat up; which they did so entirely, that they were looked upon by all people as a plague sent by God, and are therefore called by Joel his army, ii. 25. So not only the Hebrews, but the Arabians esteemed them; who say, that some of them on a time fell before their prophet, as he sat at meat, with this inscription on their backs: "I am God, and there is none other beside me, the Lords of locusts, who nourish them; and when I please, send them forth, that they may be food for the people; and when I please, that they may be their plague, by eating up their food" (see Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 6).

Ver. 39. Thou shalt plant vineyards, and dress them.] Take a great deal of care and pains about them, after they are planted, to make them fruitful. But shall neither drink of the wine nor gather the grapes.] Not enjoy the least benefit by their cost and labours.

For the worms shall eat them.] The Hebrew word tholath is a general name for all worms whatsoever; but there is a peculiar sort that infest vines, which the Greeks call ixistes, and ixes, as Bochartus observes, in his Hierozoicon, par. ii. lib. iv. cap. 27, where he takes notice that the Latins call this worm rotenon, and convolulatus: because it wraps and rolls itself up in the buds, and eats the grapes up when they grow towards ripeness, as the Roman authors explain it.

Ver. 40. Thou shalt have olive trees—but thou shalt not anoint thyself with the oil.] Though the country abounded with these trees in all parts of it, they produced nothing but leaves, and a show of fruit, which came to no perfection.

For thin olive shall cast his fruit.] Being blasted, as the Jerusalem Targum explains it, in the very blossom; or the buds dropping off for want of rain; or the fruit being eaten with worms. Mainonides observes, that the idolaters in those countries pretended, by certain magical arts, to preserve all manner of fruit, so that the wind should not strike it, the worms and fruit fall from the trees (as he reports their words out of their own books, which he names): therefore to deter the Israelites from all idolatrous practices, Moses here pronounces, that they should draw upon themselves those very punishments which they studied by such means to avoid (More Nevochim, par.iii. cap. 67).

Ver. 41.] Which is threatened in many places of the prophets, and fulfilled in several invasions of their neighbours; for the Syrians, no doubt, carried captive more than one little maid, who waited on Naaman's wife (2 Kings v. 2). And in other inroads upon them, till the captivity of the whole land. This we may be confident was a frequent calamity (2 Kings iv. 25, 26). But it was never more remarkably fulfilled, than since they crucified our Saviour; their children having been taken from them (as I have observed before, ver. 32, 34), and transported sometimes into other places. And who knows whether many of their stock, detained by king Emanuel of Portugal, before mentioned, have not been transported into America? and whether the Spanish colonies have not a mixture of the Jewish progeny in them? as Dr. Jackson observes. Manasseh ben Israel, I am sure, endeavours to prove (in his book called Spes Israelitis) that some of the ten tribes are in America; though how they came there, he can give no account.
CHAPTER XXVIII.

43 The stranger that is within thee shall get up above thee very high; and thou shalt come down very low.

44 He shall lend to thee, and thou shalt not lend to him: he shall be the head, and thou shalt be the tail.

45 Moreover all these curses shall come upon thee, and shall pursue thee, and overtake thee, till thou be destroyed; because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee:

46 And they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever.

47 Because thou servestst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things;

48 Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want threatened to those who bare ill-will to Sion, lighting on them and their friends; and all the blessings promised to such as prayed for her peace, being heaped on those that wrought her ruin.

Ver. 42. All thy trees, and fruit of thy land shall be the locust communes. So Onkelos and the Hebrew writers generally translate the word tsaldal; which signifies a peculiar sort of locusts which fall on trees, as others upon the fields. And it seems to have this name, because these locusts came in such thick clouds, that they darken the sun; the Hebrew word tsaldal signifying to overshadow. The Jerusalem Targum translates it, "all your trees, and the fruits of your land, shall spoilers possess." Peculiar marks fell in the order wherein they are here mentioned in vers. 38-42, there being first a great dearth, of which we read 2 Kings viii. 1, &c., and Joel i. 10-12, &c., then many invasions of their country, wherein several were carried captive by the bands of Moab upon the Israelites (2 Kings xiii. 20), and of the Chaldeans, Syrians, and Assyrians. Above all nations, they heisted him up to the very clouds, And we read expressly, that before this, in the days of Ahaz, a great multitude were carried captive by the Syrians (2 Chron. xxviii. 5). After which more spoilers came upon them in the days of Jeremiah, xii. 12, and a new famine, xiv. 1, &c., in which this forty-first verse may be thought to be fulfilled.

The punishment of the proud people, than to see those who are not only their inferiors, but much behoalden to them (as all strangers were to the Jews, among whom they lived merely by permission), get up above them, and become their superiors. But so it was, that the Jews, by their foolish endeavours to advance themselves, raised a mere stranger to the highest dignity, who humbled them down to the lowest condition. For this (as that excellent person I have often mentioned observes) may be applied to Vespasian, who was appointed to command in the wars against the Jews, and being a person of mean birth and obscure family, had no thoughts of aspiring to the imperial seat; but by the unsavourable desire of the Jews to exalt themselves above all nations, they raised him up to the sublime pitch of greatness, who was ordained by God to pluck them down from their seat, and bring them beneath all people (see Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, ch. 23, par. 3, 4, &c.). For he quite extinguished their glory, which was their temple at Jerusalem; and likewise shut up and profaned the temple of their God: for they had built in the country of Heliopolis, after it had stood above three hundred years: but if any one think good thus to apply the words of this verse unto Vespasian, they must not take this for the literal meaning of them; because it is evident, that by the stranger is to be understood those of other nations who lived among them; particularly, those gentiles, who were brought into the country by the Assyrians, instead of the ten tribes, as some of the best of the Jewish writers explain it. What the doctor also saith, concerning their advancing Vespasian to the imperial dignity, cannot be maintained.

Ver. 41.] Thus the covenant of God, to exalt his people and humble their foes, was quite inverted, as he also observes (see ver. 12, 13), all the plagues of God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which he commanded thee;

46 And they shall be upon thee for a sign and for a wonder, and upon thy seed for ever.

47 Because thou servestst not the Lord thy God with joyfulness, and with gladness of heart, for the abundance of all things;

48 Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies which the Lord shall send against thee, in hunger, and in thirst, and in nakedness, and in want threatened to those who bare ill-will to Sion, lighting on them and their friends; and all the blessings promised to such as prayed for her peace, being heaped on those that wrought her ruin.

Ver. 45. All these curses shall come upon thee.] These punishments, he means, should not cease, but follow one upon another till they had brought them to utter ruin. Which is so evidently fulfilled, that, would but the atheists consider it, and lay it to heart, it would wring from them a confession of the truth of what these Divine emblems have uttered, that "this was a people who had been appointed to destruction." For, though there be a great many of them remaining, in several parts of the world, yet they have never been suffered to grow into a nation, but in that sense are utterly destroyed, as Moses here prophesied.

Because thou hearkenedst not unto the voice of the Lord thy God, He hathmanifestly appeared the hand of God is very heavy upon them for their disobedience to him, there being no other reason why they, who were once so favoured by him, should be so long as they have been more miserable than any other people.

Ver. 46. They shall be upon thee. That is, the curses before mentioned should remain fixed upon them, and continue unremoved from age to age.

For a sign and for a wonder.] That all men may take notice of them, and look upon them as extraordinary tokens of God's high displeasure, and take warning thereby to beware of their infidelity and disobedience; for, as that great man often saith, "No sign can be given equivalent to the desolation of the Jewish nation, and their continuing still banished from their own land, and miserably treated in all other countries."

Upon thy seed for ever.] All the world may clearly see (to use his words again) that the God of their fathers hath cast them off, they having no signs or badges of his love and favor. But great marks and scars of his fearful indignation against their fathers remain unhealed in their children, after more generations than their ancestors had of prosperity in the promised land.

Ver. 47. For the abundance of all things; Or, "in the abundance of all things;" for this is opposed to the hunger and thirst "in which (he saith) he in the next verse would mention" as a reminder of the wanton abuse of God's mercies. Which being so exceeding great, justly required not only their obedience, but cheerfulness and delight therein.

Ver. 48. Therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies. He doth not call the Lord their God, as he did before, now they were abandoned by him for their sins.

In hunger, &c. Ver. 47. &c.] This shows what he meant before by "abundance of all things," plentiful provision of food and raiment, and all other things belonging to the comfort of life.

He shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck. The loss of liberty was as great a misery as any other, which ended also in hard servitude. And it was but just that they should be enslaved in the land of their enemies to cruel masters, who would not, in their own country, of all things: and he shall put a yoke of iron upon thy neck, until he have destroyed thee.

49 The Lord shall bring a nation against thee from far, from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth; a nation whose tongue thou shalt not understand;

50 A nation of fierce countenance, which shall not regard the person of the old, nor shew favour to the young:

51 And he shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, and the fruit of thy land, until thou be delivered;

A yoke of iron] Signifies an unsupportable yoke, which could not be broken (see Jer. xxviii. 13, 14).

Ver. 49. Bringing a nation against thee from far.] This evidently belongs to the Romans, as Manasses ben Israel acknowledges; who thinks, that at this verse begins his prophecy of their calamities under the second temple, as in the foregoing he describes their calamities under the first. And in this, I think, he shall eat the fruit of thy land, is scarcer than in the following part of this chapter, but what relates to what they suffered under the second temple (as he speaks), and since its destruction; though I cannot say, as he doth, of the foregoing part of it, that it was fulfilled in the calamities which befell them under the first temple; for many things were never so completely fulfilled, as since they crucified our Saviour.

From the end of the earth.] This shows he speaks of the Romans, rather than of the Chaldeans, who did not come "from far," much less "from the end of the earth," but out of the north country, which was not very far distant from Judea; whereas the Romans, by whom they were last destroyed, came literally "from far," and "from the end of the earth;" particularly Julius Severus was called by the emperor Adrian to their destruction out of this island of Britain; wherein Vespasian also had given great proof of his conduct. And Adrian himself, and Trajan, by whom they were still more crushed, after Vespasian had destroyed their city and temple, were both Spaniards by birth. And, therefore, Manasses ben Israel says peremptorily, in his book, De Termino Vite (lib. iii. sect. 3), this is to be understood of the soldiers in Vespasian's army, which he brought out of England, France, and Spain, and other remote parts of the world.

As swift as the eagle.] Which every one knows the Romans used in their ensigns. And these birds are observed to fly upon their prey with great force and violence; to whom, therefore, fierce soldiers (such as the Romans were) are compared, when they set upon their enemies. So Homer describes Achilles falling upon the Trojans, ελευθεριάν ὑπὲρ γέροντας... In Iliad 9, where ὑπὲρ signifies ὑπεράντερα, "furious assailants," as the English translators have it. And so he speaks concerning Hector, Iliad X. As David also speaks of Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 23, and the Chaldeans are so described, coming against Jerusalem, Jer. iv. 13, xviii. 40, xlix. 22; Lam. i. 19; Ezek. xvii. 3; and see Dan. vii. 4, and Bochartus, in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 9, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 2. But in none of these texts doth σταφυλίας, "strong, as since they crucified our Saviour.

The Roman tongue was more strange to them than the Chaldean, especially the language of many nations, of which the Roman army was composed; and being a people whose ancestors, perhaps, never heard of. Dr. Jackson justly looks upon the destruction and general desolation of their country, made by the Romans and their tributaries in these western parts stroyed: which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, or the increase of thy kine, or flocks of thy sheep, until he have destroyed thee.

52 And he shall besiege thee in all thy gates, until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst, throughout all thy land: and he shall besiege thee in all thy gates throughout all thy land, which the Lord thy God hath given thee.

53 And thou shalt eat the fruit of thine own of the world, as an everlasting monument of the truth of Moses's prophecy, in this and in the following verses.

Ver. 50. A nation] This word nation being used thrice in this and the foregoing verse, Manasses ben Israel (in the place forenamed) is so critical, as to observe, that this repetition shows Jerusalem was to suffer thrice by the Roman power: first, in the time of Pompey; and, secondly, when Sosius came to the assistance of Herod against Antigonus; and, thirdly, when it was besieged and overthrown by Vespasian and his son Titus, whom they purchased by a most inflexibly pursued their designs; which is the true character of the old Romans.

Which shall not regard the person of the old, nor show favour to the young.] These are wont to be pitied, being unable to hurt others; but in their wars with the Jews, the Romans spared nobody, their rage and fury extending to the utterance of gray hairs, and all tenderness to young babes.

Ver. 51. He shall eat the fruit of thy cattle, &c.] For they brought such vast armies, as devoured all the provisions in the country.

Which also shall not leave thee either corn, wine, or oil, &c.] He repeats it again, in more particular words, to set forth the desolation to be so great, that nothing should remain for their support.

Ver. 52. He shall besiege thee in all thy gates.] The country being wasted, the Jews fled into their fenced cities, where they had laid up some provisions, to enable them to hold out a siege.

Until thy high and fenced walls come down, wherein thou trustedst.] This was literally fulfilled by the Romans, to whom the best fortified places were forced to yield, as may be seen in Josephus's History of the Jewish War, which is the best commentary on this part of the prophecy. The walls of Jerusalem particularly were razed by Pompey; and Sosius took it again by force in the time of Augustus. But Tacitus tells, that the Jews took such advantage of the clemency of Claudius, that they purchased of him the liberty to fortify their city again: which they did so well, that they trusted, as Moses here speaks, to its strength; which was so great, that Titus could not take it but by a long siege, which concluded in its utter ruin.

He shall besiege thee in all thy gates.] He repeats it again, that they might not think to find security in any place whatsoever, though never so strongly fortified, and well provided with all things necessary for its defence.

Ver. 53.] This was fulfilled to a little by Vespasian and his son Titus; who, after they had vanquished them in the field, begirt them so close in Jerusalem, that they could not stir out, and rather than sur-body, the flesh of thy sons and of thy daughters, which the Lord thy God hath given thee, in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thin enemies shall distress thee:

54 So that the man that is tender among you, and very delicate, his eye shall be evil toward his brother, and toward the wife of his bosom, and toward the remnant of his children which he shall leave:

55 So that he will not give to any of them of the flesh of his children whom he shall eat: because he hath nothing left him in the siege, and in the straitness, wherewith thin enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates.

56 The tender and delicate woman among you, which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicateness and tenderness, her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, and toward her son, and toward her daughter, 57 And toward her young one that cometh out from between her feet, and toward her children which she shall bear: for she shall eat them for want of all things secretly in the siege and the straitness, wherewith thin enemies shall distress thee in all thy gates.

Ver. 56. The tender and delicate woman, &c.] A description of the greatest softness and delicacy: both which the Chaldees express by a word that signifies the nicest motion, and going so slow a pace, as if they were loth to touch the ground (see Bochartus, in his Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 19).

Her eye shall be evil toward the husband of her bosom, &c.] This shows either a higher instance of the cruel effects of their distress by famine: for women, especially of the better sort, are naturally more tender and pitiful than men, and have the most passionate love to their children; which Moses here prophesies should be quite extinguished by hunger. And it was literally fulfilled, both in the siege of Samaria, wherein a woman boiled her own son before their eyes (2 Kings v. 26), as a man did in the first siege of Jerusalem by the Babylonians (Baruch ii. 3, and see Lam. ii. 20, iv. 10). But never so exactly fulfilled as in the last siege by the Romans, when a noble woman (which fully answers to this prophecy, such persons being very delicate) did the very same, as Josephus relates in his book of the Jewish Wars, lib. vii. cap. 9. A most unnatural cruelty, which was never committed either by Greek or barbarian; and which he would not have related, because it might seem incredible, if there had not been many witnesses of it besides himself.

Ver. 57. Toward her young one.] Toward her new-born babe, which is wont to be welcomed into the world with great joy; but in this siege despachted out of it, to satisfy the rage of the hungry. In the Hebrew (as we take notice in the margin) the word we translate young one, properly signifies the after-birth: and so the LXX. translate it, τὸ ἀφεροῦσαν. Which makes this passage most plain; that their hunger should make them so unnatural, as first to eat the after-birth which came from them, and then the child which was wrappèd up in it.

Toward her children.] The rest of their children, whose cries for food they had no way to stop, but by killing them, and making them their own food. So it follows in the next words.

For she shall eat them for want of all things.] Having nothing else left to eat: for they had devoured, not only the leather of their girdles and their shoes, and which covered their shields, but the very stable dung of oxen, and such things as the most sordid of all living creatures would not eat (see Josephus, lib. iii. "Antiq." cap. 16, lib. vii. cap. 7).

Secretly.] It was not done secretly for any other reason, but lest anybody should have a share with them, and so make their hunger return the sooner; yet it was a hard matter to conceal what they had done of this kind; for the seditions people presently smelling there had been something boiled, got into the house when she had eaten one half of her child, and found the other half, which she had left till another time; of which she invited them to eat.

In the siege and straitness.] These two words which are used here and ver. 53, and 55, may both straitness, wherewith thine enemy shall distress thee in thy gates.

58 If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD THY GOD;

59 Then the Lord will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues, and of long continuance, and sore sicknesses, and of long continuance.

60 Moreover he will bring upon thee all the diseases of Egypt, which thou wast afraid of; and they shall cleave unto thee.

61 Also every sickness, and every plague, which is not written in the book of this law, they shall bring upon thee, until thou be destroyed.

62 And ye shall be left few in number, whereas ye were as the stars of heaven for multitude; because thou wouldst not obey the voice of the Lord thy God.

63 And it shall come to pass, that as the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, and to multiply you; so the Lord will rejoice over you up his throne at Bitter, in the tribe of Benjamin, which the Jews had made their chief seat after the destruction of Jerusalem and had in it, as they pretend, four hundred synagogues. Here the Romans made such a slaughter of them, when they took it, that the Jews themselves cannot find expressions tragical enough to represent it. Twice as many, they tell us, perished now as came out of Egypt; great rivers ran with the blood of the slain, which (say some of them) carried great rocks along with them. With these and many other such like hyperbolical speeches, they themselves exaggerate their calamities, as many have observed out of Juchasim and Gitin, particularly Const. L'Empeure, in his annotations on Jachiedes (Dan. xi. 34).

But though now they were left few in number in Judea, yet, in other countries where they were dispersed, they multiplied again, that God's plagues might continue to be multiplied upon them, and this prophecy more perfectly fulfilled: for some ages after this (anno 1009), they had so infected Christian people against them, by bringing the Persians upon them, who destroyed the churches dedicated to our Saviour at Jerusalem, that it was resolved by the consent of all Christians, that no Jew should live in their territories, but be driven out of them throughout all the world. By which means the greatest part of them died of several kinds of death, or made away themselves, so that vix panel residui furent in orbe Romano, "there remained but a very few of them in the Roman world." They are the words of Glanvill, who relates this, lib. iii. cap. 7.

Ver. 63. As the Lord rejoiced over you to do you good, so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you.

The state of the Jews, from the time of Adrian till the expiration of the Roman empire, cannot be gathered from the Roman writers; but the fathers of the church often mention their miseries. And so do nearly the author of Schebet Judah, who saith, "It is not in the power of man to tell all the kingdoms and cities where they were scattered, in which they suffered things so horrid, that it is fitter to pass them over in silence, than to relate them: but therein was verified the Divine prediction, Lev. xvi. 28, "Ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up" (sect. 49). And Dr. Jackson, to explain this, hath more particularly observed, that as God raised up Cyrus in testimony of his "rejoicing to do them good," who released them from their captivity in Babylon; so, to give the world a proof of his "rejoicing to destroy them, and bring them to nought," he advanced Phillipus Augustus, etc. (about anno 1179), to defeat all the hopes which some kindness shown unto them had put into their hearts: for he spoiled their synagogues of all their donatives and ornaments, confiscated all their lands and immovable goods, and granted a release of all debts due unto them from Christians (see book i. upon the Creed, ch. 23, parag. 13). This was wonderfully fulfilled by Adrian; who, after a strange dissolution, before mentioned, prohibited, by a public decree ratified with the senate's consent, any Jew to come within sight of Juden. This he did out of a politic respect, lest the sight of their native soil might inspire them with some fresh desperate resolutions to...
to destroy you, and to bring you to nought; and ye shall be plucked from off the land whither thou goest to possess it.

64 And the Lord shall scatter thee among all people, from the one end of the earth even unto the other; and there thou shalt serve other gods, which neither thou nor thy fathers have known, even wood and stone.

65 And among these nations shalt thou find no ease, neither shall the sole of thy foot have fallen them, he saith, "This we see fulfilled, after a singular manner, in this present captivity; because of all those evils wherewith the Hebrews have been afflicted in France, and England, and Spain:" for they have been often pressed, either to renounce their religion, or to be undone; and many times chose rather to comply with the idolatrous worship in the Roman church, than to be banished, and have their goods confiscated.

Ver. 66. Among these nations shalt thou find no ease." This was wonderfully fulfilled in the ages which followed that in which Adrian lived: when they both disturbed others, and could find no rest themselves: for in the third century, they raised sedition in the reign of Severus, by whom they suffered very much about the year 203, after our Saviour's birth; and in the next century we are informed by St. Chrysostom, in his second creation against the Jews (tom. iii. epist. i.), that the Roman synod held at the time of Constantine; who, causing their ears to be cropped off, dispersed them, ἀκούσαντες τοὺς δραπάνους καὶ μαστίγοις, "as vile fugitives and vagabonds, into various countries, where they carried this mark of infamy along with them, that all might be instructed to make no more such attempts." But in the fifth century, when Cyril, bishop of Alexandria (anno 431), was the very hunter himself, who had driven out of Alexandria for their seditious practices, where they had been settled ever since the time of Alexander the Great, and dispersed into several countries, as Socrates observes in his Ecclesiastical History, lib. vii. cap. 16. And in the next chapter relates how miserably they were deluded in Crete, by one who pretended to be Moses come down from heaven to lead them to their own land through the sea; into which many threw themselves, and perished. That expulsion out of Alexandria is mentioned by David Ganz also, one of their own authors. In the sixth century, as Elmacinus tells us, they again rebelled in Palestine against the Romans, who slew a great number of them. And in the seventh, they were expelled from Antioch and Phoenicia, by the Persians. That bustion out of Spain (anno 604), by Sisebutus, or, as some call him, Sisebodus, king of the Goths; and they flying in great numbers into France were shortly after put to this hard choice, either to renounce their religion, or lose all they had; which persecution, Dr. Jackson observes, in the book often mentioned (ch. 28, parag. 1), is recorded by those who wrote the life of Dagobert, as one of the chief memorables of his reign. What their state was in the next three centuries, he saith, he had observed nothing remarkable; nor can I find any thing notable in the eighth, but the appearance of a false Messiah, by whom they were deluded, and brought into trouble. As for the ninth, there were no lessened men among them in that age, nor in the Christian world. And in the tenth they were in the same condition; insomuch, that they were fain to make a weaver the head of one of their universities.

Neither shall the sole of thy foot have rest." They being not able to obtain a long settlement anywhere; but were tossed up and down, and forced from one country to another: for so it was, that, in the beginning of the eleventh century, about the year of our Lord one thousand, they were so vexed throughout the most part of Europe that quid agerent, aut quod se verterent necsebant, "they knew not what they should do, or which way they should turn themselves" as the forenamed doctor observes (par. 4), out of Papius Massonius, who hath it out of Glauber. To which I will add this testimony out of David Ganz, in his book called Tzemach David, that in the latter end of the twelfth century there was a famous expedition for the recovery of the Holy Land, "the Jews felt it a most calamitous time" (as he speaks), being robbed, and pillaged, and killed, by the soldiers as they went along. And, indeed, so much cruelty was exercised upon them, that it moved St. Bernard’s compassion to write to the bishop, clergy, and people of Spire, not to persecute them, much less kill them or drive them out of their country: "For they are dispersed (saith he) into all lands, that while they suffer the just punishment of their horrid wickedness they may be witnesses of our redemption," Epist. 332. And the author of Schebet Judah, mentioning their banishment out of Savoy, Peidmont, Lombardy, Sicily, and other countries, quotes these very words, that came out of [among those instances in his shall find no rest," K.c. ] as a prophecy of that exile: which was accompanied with many other mischiefs: for, as they fled to other countries, an immense multitude of people fell upon them, and pillaged them of all the gold and silver they were carrying away with them, as he relates there, sect. 11. Similar instances was:

They being always in dread of some new misery, their condition still growing more dismal in the twelfth century: for as there is a progress in Moses’s prophecy of the increase of their calamities; so it proved in the event, that their sufferings grew greater and greater. They themselves (in Tzemach David, and other books) relate, that in the year 1142, a hundred and two thousand of their congregations were utterly subverted and dispersed. And in the year 1170, they were expelled again out of France, and spoiled of their treasure, which was renewed in the year 1198. How they were used here in England, our own chronicles tell us; and the like ill-usage they met withal in Germany and Spain: so that R. Zacut complains of no less than hundred, and the sufferings, in this one age, to abolish the name of Jews out of the world. This could not but give them a very trembling heart.

Failing of eyes.] Which looked for some relief; instead whereof they were still more hardly used in the thirteenth century, being, in the year 1353 again expelled out of France, whither they had returned; and again in 1395, when they expected some rest, there was a fresh expulsion, mentioned by R. Levi ben Gerson, who saith they were spoiled of all their goods, and sent away only with their clothes upon their backs. Which he affirms with the more confidence, because it was done in his time, when he saith, there was such a number of them, that they exceeded those that came out of Egypt. Of those complaints of no less an exposition of those words, Numb. xxiii. 10: "Who can count the dust of Jacob?" I will forbear to mention how they were treated here in England (1290), and in Germany; into which they flying out of France were most cruelly used.

Sorrow of mind.] Which must needs seize upon them heavily to feel their loss. For they had such bitter miseries so far from abating, that they still increased in the fourteenth century: when they were banished again out of France, and spoiled of their goods, 1306, and once more 1395, which the Jews call their fourth and last banishment. About the same time they were banished out of Germany, anno 1392. In Castile, indeed, they redeemed their lives with money (which they could not part withal without much sorrow of mind), but in Catalonia, Aragon, and in other parts of Spain, such a terrible storm fell upon them, that they themselves, as the author of Schebet Judah speaks, so was there a number of thousand turned Christians, with heavy hearts. It would be too tedious to mention all that they suffered in the fourteenth century in Germany, Hungary, Poland, and in Italy, Spain, and Portugal. I will only observe what befell them in the country last named, in the next century, anno 1506, when all that is said in this verse is true, and heavy that miserable massacre, for which was made of them at Lisbon for three days together; where men were not suffered to die of their deadly wounds, but were dragged by their mangled limbs into the market-place, where the bodies of the living, and the slain, with others half alive, half dead, were burnt together in heaps. The spectacle was so horrible, that it quite astonished the rest of this generation, of which perished in this barbarous manner. Parents durst not mourn for their children, nor children sigh for their parents, when they saw them haled to the place of torment; so that their hearts, no doubt, were ready to break with grief and sorrow. In short, Sic eos metus examinavit, ut vivi non multum a mortuis, simulacra. These words of Moses, though Orosius did not think of them, "I will give thee a trembling heart, and failing of the eyes, and heavy that miserable massacre, for which they should suffer the same before the breath was out of their tortured bodies.

There are those who, by a trembling heart, understand the terrors of an evil conscience; so D. Chytreus, p. 131. And by failing of the eyes may be understood, the constant disappointment of their hopes, wherewith they were sometimes led by false Messiahs in several ages; which disappointment bred great sorrow of mind; when after the reception of some good, the quite contrary came upon them.

Ver. 66. Thy life shall hang in doubt before thee.] That is, it should be doubtful whether they should live or die the next moment. As it manifestly happened in the forenamed massacre, when they durst not fetch a sigh, and yet could hardly avoid it, at the sight of their parents’ or children’s tortures, for they should suffer the same before the breath was out of their tortured bodies.

Thou shalt fear day and night.] So it was then: none of them knowing who would be next seized, in those three days’ butchery. And so it was in some of their banishments, which, they were told, should be the best remedy for the evils impending over them, as the author of Schebet Judah speaks, who tells us (sect. 23), that the reason which some princes gave for their expulsion out of their territories was, to prevent their being torn in pieces by the people, who were most furiously set against them.

Ver. 67. In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were even?] That they might not see those miserable spectacles, which they hoped would end in the night, when men went to rest.

At even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning?] Being afraid of unseen dangers, to which the night might give an opportunity; or, that they might not see their way, when they fled by sea and land, Deuteronomy.

67 In the morning thou shalt say, Would God it were event! and at even thou shalt say, Would God it were morning! for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see.

68 And the Lord shall bring thee into Egypt from one country to another, as they were forced to do very often: for Abarbinel, in his Commentary upon Isaiah xi. 11, reckons up four universal banishments, out of the countries where they lived. The first out of England; the next out of France; the third out of Asia; and the last, out of Spain. Long before the last out of Spain; when he himself was one of those who were constrained to leave that country, and knew not whither to go. He hath given us a lively description of that calamity (like to which, he saith, none had ever befallen them, since they were banished their own country) in his preface to his Commentary upon the Book of the Kings, which he wrote the very next year after their expulsion (1543), and the author of Schebet Judah hath transcribed in his own words:—"A decree was made and proclaimed publicly, that all the Jews should change their religion, or quit the country in three months' time. Abarbinel had then a place in the court, where he petitioned the king, and besought his ministers and counsellors to return the edict, and be content with their glorious their estates, which they offered to him; but all in vain: for three hundred thousand, old and young, men and women, and he among the rest, went away on foot upon one day, not knowing whither to go. Some went into Portugal, others into Navarre; where they conflicted with many calamities: for some because they perished by the sword, and some by famine, and some by disease. And therefore others committed themselves to the sea, hoping to find a quiet seat in some other countries. But on the sea they met with new disasters; for many were sold as slaves when they came on any coast, many were drowned, many burnt in the ships which were set on fire: in short, all suffered the just punishment of God the avenger (as he speaks) for after all this, a plague came and swept away the rest of the miserable wretches, who were hated by all mankind; so that all that vast number perished by one calamity or other, except a very few." He that would see more of the woful miseries of this people, may look into Schebet Judah, sect. 53, where he shows what befell those who went to seek new habitations in the kingdom of Fess, where they lived a long time upon grass, and ate its very roots, and then died, and their bodies lay exposed, none being so charitable as to bury them.

For the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear,—The one of these seems to refer to their dreadful apprehensions in the night; and the other to the lamentable spectacles they beheld in the day. And the simple meaning of the former part of the verse may be, that they should be weary of life, having no comfort either day or night.

Ver. 68. The Lord shall bring thee into Egypt again.] The Jerusalem Targum translates it, "The Word of the Lord shall bring thee back again. He, that is, who conducteth them out of Egypt in glorious clout, would punish them for their foul offences against him, by bringing them again into bondage there. This was first fulfilled after the desolation made by Titus; when there were, as I observed before (ver. 62), above ninety thousand carried captive, and many of them transported into Egypt, as Josephus relates, in the conclusion of the seventy and pestilence. And here Manasseh ben Israel hath a very pertinent observation, that Vespasian transported them into many and various regions: but Egypt is only here named, the more to reproach the Jews: as if he had said, "Ye shall be carried into that land as captives, out of which ye came in a triumphant manner," lib. iii. De Termino Vite, sect. iii., which may incline one to think, that he was of the same mind with our Dr. Jackson, who, observing how cruelly they were punished for their idolatries, and Saviour's words, that "he that doeth the things of the devil, is the son of the devil," concludes, that this island, and every place of Europe, wherein their condition of life hath been more hard and burdensome than their forefathers' was in Egypt, may be said to be that Egypt, into which God threatens here to bring them in ships.

And, indeed, we do not read of their being carried into Egypt after Vespasian's time; they were sold for one small piece of money. Josephus, giving a particular account how the captives were disposed of by Titus, saith, that the most goodly young men he reserved to attend his triumph; of the rest, he ordered those above seventy years old to be sent bound into Egypt, to labour in the works there; many he distributed in the provinces to perish in the theatre by the sword and wild beasts; and all under seventeen years old he commanded to be sold. But while they were making this distribution, twelve thousand of them died of famine; partly by the hatred of their guards, who gave them no food; and partly by the weakness of others, whose stomachs could not receive it (lib. vii. cap. 16). By which a judgment may be made how little worth were the tears of our fathers, as it here follows. In after times, I have observed, in the course of this Commentary, how they were sold for slaves in some places, and in all used as no better. Benjamin Tudeleensis, who went a pilgrimage to visit his countrymen, represents their condition as most miserable throughout agam with ships, by the way whereof I spake unto thee, Thou shalt see it no more again: and there ye shall be sold unto your enemies in the eastern empire. And particularly complains of their hard usage among the Greeks at Constantinople: within the walls of which city they were not suffered to live, nor to come thither, but on occasion of traffic and business; and that only by boat (for they had their habitation in a kind of an island), not a man being permitted on horseback, except only one, Soliman, the emperor's physician. Whose advancement was their sole comfort in that miserable servitude, under which the rest groaned, without any difference of good or bad (as he acknowledges), who were daily beaten and abused in the open streets. Thus he confesses, though his principal design was to set forth the power they retained in the world (Itinerarium, p. 27, 28, edit. L'Empeure).

No man shall buy you.] Though some, as I said before, were sold at a very vile rate, next to nothing; yet others hung upon the seller's hands (as we speak), the market being either so overstocked with their numbers, that none would cheapen the greatest part of them, or they were so contemptible that nobody would give what was asked for such useless slaves: for, as no money could purchase their peace and security from calamities, so neither could the calamities, though continually most grievous (they are the words of Dr. Jackson), redeem their estimation in the world; nor all the blood of their slain (though their massacres were numberless) extinguish that hateful and loathsome conceit which most men had entertained of them. For in the fifteenth century they were become so abominable, that several doctors began to hold it unlawful for Christians to let them live among them. Particularly the famous Thomas Terrecerama, inquisitor-general, forbade all men to have any dealings with them, or to afford them meat or drink, or any thing else. Whence proceed the direful proscriptions which we read of in that age, whereby they were forced out of Spain, Poland, Hungary, and divers other countries; where they were not suffered to live, though with a note and character upon them to distinguish them from all other men.

I conclude my observations on this chapter, with the remark which the same great man (Dr. Jackson) makes, ch. 22, paragr. 6. That the extraordinary blessings and plagues which were to overtake this people, being here set down by Moses; although their blessings might have been more and more admirable than the curses that have befallen them, yet he, either foreseeing or fearing what would be, rather than hoping the best that might be, is almost four times as long in enumerating their plagues as he is in their blessings. And so have the miseries of the latter Jews been four times as long as the prosperity of their worthy ancestors. And since our Saviour's death, all the plagues, which were in part fulfilled before, have been more than seven times multiplied upon them. For in their former overthrows or capitulations, though they suffered the violence of war, yet, after that storm was past, so they did but submit to their conquerors, they lived well enough, nay, usually found more than ordinary favour at their hands; but since our Saviour's death, they have through all ages been more and more miserable; "the memory of the foregoing plagues having been but an invitation to the like, or worse; and their continual bad usage prescribing the lawfulness of their abuse."

CHAPTER XXIX.

I Moses exhorteth them to obedience, by the memory of the works they have seen. 10 All are presented before the Lord to enter into his covenant. 18 The great wrath on him that flattereth himself in his wickedness. 29 Secret things belong unto God.

1 These are the words of the covenant, which the Lord commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. These are the words of the covenant.] The Talmudists in the Gemara of Sota, cap. 7, sect. 24, refer these words to the benedictions and cursings mentioned in the foregoing chapter; plainly belong to what God delivered unto Moses in Mount Sinai at the first; which he had now repeated in this book, with the addition of several blessings and curses to make what he said the more effectual.

Commanded Moses to make.] That is, to renew. For which end Moses repeated the principal laws of God, and explained them in this book; which is from thence called Deuteronomy; being a compendium of the Pentateuch, a breviary of the covenant, composed for the familiar and daily use of the children of Israel.

In the land of Moab,] Where he declared to them the law which he had formerly delivered to their fathers (Deut. i. 5).

Beside the covenant which he made with them in Horeb.] This doth not signify that he made a covenant with them, different from the former made at Horeb (Exod. xxix.) but only now renewed the same covenant, after they had shamefully violated it more than once. Which was the more necessary, because they were ready to enter into the land of Canaan, and he was just upon his departure from them into another world; and therefore did all he could to engage them in a more firm obedience to God. And for that end, both more fully explained several laws, and added others, and at large laid before them the happiness or the misery that would ensue upon their fidelity or falseness in this covenant.

Ver. 2. Moses called unto all Israel.] This seems to import a new summons which he sent out to them, to attend him, now he was about to conclude what he had to say to them, before he left them. Which he did not, as I have often observed (see ver. 1), all at once, in one continued speech, but at several times; and now was about to wind up all in this and the next chapter.
3 The great temptations which thine eyes have seen, the signs, and those great miracles:
4 Yet the Lord hath not given you an heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, unto this day.
5 And I have led you forty years in the wilderness: your clothes are not waxen old upon you, and thy shoe is not waxen old upon thy foot.
6 Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: that ye might know that I am the Lord your God.
7 And when ye came unto this place, Sihon the king of Heshbon, and Og the king of Bashan, came out against us unto battle, and we smote them:
8 And we took their land, and gave it for an inheritance unto the Reubenites, and to the Gadites, and to the half tribe of Manasseh.
9 Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them, that ye may prosper in all that ye do.
10 ¶ Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord your God; your captains of your tribes, your elders, and your officers, with all the men of Israel,

Said unto them.] He argued with them from the knowledge and experience which they had of the power of God in his wonderful works, particularly three, which were very memorable. Those in Egypt, which he mentions here in the next two verses; and those in the wilderness, ver. 5, 6, and lately in the great victory he had given them over two potent kings, ver. 7, 8.

Ver. 3. Of these he had put them in mind before (see vi. 15, vii. 16.)

Ver. 4. They had not so considered and laid to heart God’s wonderful works, as to have a lasting sense of them bestowed upon them by God. He gives us an understanding heart, but we must first consider what he hath done for us, as the apostle instructs us, 2 Tim. ii. 7. And he gives us what we do not receive; and so in effect it is not given. Thus he saith himself, Matt. v. 5, but they would not be purged (Ezek. xxiv. 13.

What the difference is between a heart to perceive, and eyes to see, and ears to hear, need not he curiously inquired. They are, perhaps, but three various expressions of their gross stupidity, or three degrees of it, which was so great, that they had no continued sense of the wonderful works God had done for them; nor did so much as regard and observe them; nor, nor hearken to those who put them in mind of them; which must not be imputed to any want of power in these things to move them, much less of the Divine grace to work upon their hearts by them, but was wholly to be ascribed to their own negligence and perverseness; of which God here complains, and with which he so frequently upbraids them, that he had not given them this grace; which is a clear demonstration the fault was in themselves. And therefore Maimo-nides rightly and judiciously explains these words, when he saith, the meaning is, They had not disposed themselves to receive this grace from God.

Ver. 5. I have led you forty years; a glorious cloud, which both conducted and protected them (viii. 2, xi. 5.) Concerning these forty years, see ch. ii. 7.

Your clothes are not waxen old, &c. See viii. 4. The Jews used no shoes in Egypt, as Bochartus probably conjectures; but being to take a long journey, through a rough way in the wilderness, he commanded them to eat the passover with shoes on their feet (Exod. xii. 11), and these very shoes which they put on at that festival, when they were ready to march, God suffered not to decay in all their travels for forty years following (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50).

Ver. 6. Ye have not eaten bread, neither have ye drunk wine or strong drink: Not commonly, though, when they passed through some neighbouring country, they might possibly sometimes purchase both bread and wine, or strong liquors; but their ordinary food was the heavenly manna, and their drink was the water that followed them out of the rock. So that the meaning is, they were constantly supported by a miraculous supply from God, who took care of them, and thereby laid a greater obligation upon them to serve him, who so graciously fed them without any labour of their own. For they neither ploughed, nor sowed, nor reap’d, nor took any other pains for this provision; as they must have done for bread and wine, or other liquors pressed out of dates or figs, &c.

That ye might know that I am the Lord your God.] This he did for them, that he might breed and maintain them in a sense of his omnipotent power, and of his all-sufficient goodness and faithfulness to his promises; which he intended to demonstrate at his first giving of manna to them (Exod. xvi. 13.

Ver. 7. When ye came unto this place.] For they were now in a part of the country which they conquered (iv. 45, 46, &c.), Sihon king of Heshbon, &c. See Num. xxxi. 24, 34, 35; Deut. ii. 30, &c., iii. 2, 3, &c.

Ver. 8. See Num. xxxii. 33, and Deut. iv. 12, &c.

Ver. 9. Keep therefore the words of this covenant, and do them.] Preserve them in memory, so as to make good your engagements which you passed to God in Horeb; which Moses was now about to renew, and by a fresh obligation on them. For most of them being a new generation, and now going to enter upon the possession of the land of promise, it was necessary to make them sensible of the condition of their tenure, by engaging them in a solemn covenant to observe the laws of God faithfully; which was but a renewal of what was made before at Horeb.

That ye may prosper.] See iv. 6. The Hebrew word which we translate prosper, the LXX. translate act prudently; for they translate it ἐπισιωταί. And the Vulgar, to the same purpose, ut intelligatis, that ye may understand to manage yourselves wisely in all your undertakings, by observing the rules God hath given you; which was the way to prosper.

Ver. 10. Ye stand this day all of you before the Lord] The summons which he sent out (ver. 2), it seems by this, was to appear at the tabernacle, where they now stood; and from whence he delivered these words to them, by the priests and Levites (xxvii. 9, 14).
Your captains of your tribes. In the Hebrew, your heads of your tribes, who were the greatest persons in the nation, called sometimes princes.
Your elders. These were not only the seventy elders, mentioned Num. xi. 16, but all the other judges in their several courts, who are often called by the name of elders in this book, particularly xix. 12, 18, xxi. 2, 4, 6, xxv. 8.
Your officers. Who attended upon the judge, to execute his sentence (see xvi. 18).
With all the men. All the men of their several tribes.
Ver. 11. Your little ones, your wives. Who were all now present, or else were represented by the men of Israel.
Thy stranger. Whether Egyptians, that followed them when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xii. 38), or other people who embraced their religion, so far, at least, to renounce all idolatry.
From the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water. The meanest servant, whom they had bought, perhaps with their money, either in Egypt, or since they came from thence.
Ver. 12. That thou shouldst enter into covenant. In the Hebrew the words are, “pass into covenant.”
Into his oath. The Hebrew word which we translate oath, rather imports a curse, which was annexed to an oath, And so the LXX. is τό ταύτα; διότι; for they entered into this covenant with such imprecations upon themselves, as are mentioned xxvii. 15, 16, &c., wishing, perhaps, that they might be cut to pieces, as the sacrifice was (between whose parts they passed), if they did not faithfully perform their engagement.
Which the Lord thy God maketh with thee. For the original text was natural, as appears by the burning lamp, representing the Divine Majesty passing through the pieces of the sacrifice, when God entered into a covenant with Abraham (Gen. xv. 17).
Ver. 13. That he may establish thee to day for a people unto himself. Confirm them in all the privileges which they had often forfeited by breaking his covenant; of being his peculiarly above all people (Exod. xix. 5; Deut. xix. 2).
That he may be unto thee a God. Bless them and do them good as he had solemnly promised.

11 Your little ones, your wives, and thy stranger that is in thy camp, from the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water:

12 That thou shouldst enter into covenant with the Lord thy God, and into his oath, which the Lord thy God maketh with thee this day:

13 That he may establish thee this day to be a people unto himself, and that he may be unto thee a God, as he hath said unto thee, and as he hath sworn unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.

14 Neither with you only do I make this covenant and this oath;

15 But with him that standeth here with us this day before the Lord our God, and also with him that is not here with us this day:

16 (For ye know how we have dwelt in the land of Egypt; and how we came through the nations which ye passed by;

17 And ye have seen their abominations, and their idols, wood and stone, silver and gold, which were among them):

Hath sworn unto thy fathers, Gen. xii. 2, 3, xvii. 7, 8, xxii. 16, 17, xxvi. 3, 4, xxviii. 13, 14.

Ver. 15. I think the particle ki (which begins this verse) should not be translated but; and to show them the same with what we said before, not distinct from it: and therefore should be translated thus, “As with him that standeth here with us before, that is not here with us this day;” i.e. with all that were absent from the present assembly, and with all future posterity, who were as yet unborn. So the Jerusalem Targum understands the latter part of this verse, and all following generations shall be dealt with as if they stood here with us to-day.” and so Uzzielides, as they call him, “With all generations to come, unto the end of the world, as if they stood here with us at this present.”

For perpetual leagues are sometimes made between whole nations; for whom some contract in the name and place of all the rest, and bind not only themselves but their successors; and thus kings covenant to their subjects, upon conditions which their families are bound to perform in after ages, or else lose the benefit of them.

Ver. 18. For ye know we have dwelt in the land of Egypt. These words, and those that follow in this and the next verse, come in as an argument to move them to enter into this covenant; and to show them the necessity of what we said it.

For, as God had wonderfully multiplied them in the land of Egypt, so he delivered them from thence no less wonderfully, when they were miserably enslaved; which was such a mercy, as ought never to be forgotten (and therefore frequently mentioned in this book) and laid an obligation upon them to be wholly devoted to him, as his redeemed people.

How we came through the nations. The Edomites, Midianites, Ammonites, and Moabites, through the skirts of whose countries they passed, and were preserved from receiving any hurt by them.

Ver. 17. Ye have seen their abominations, and their idols. They had opportunity in Egypt of seeing too much of their vile idolatries. And so they had as they passed by the country of Moab and Midian, when some of them were seduced to the worship of Baal-Peor; though, if they had not been blinded by their lust, they could not but have seen how contemptible an idol that was, and have abominated it. All the idols of the heathen are frequently called abominations; and in Lev. xxvi. 30, they are called abhominations, to express the utmost contempt of them. And some think they are so called, not only in regard of their matter, but in form, being gilgalim, which we translate in the margin dungsil-gods, to express the utmost contempt of them. And some think they are so called, not only in regard of their matter, but ob formam scarabaei habitantis in stercore, “for the form of the beetle, which lives in dung;” for so Isis, the great goddess of the Egyptians, was represented, as tells us, in his book De Iside et Osiride. But whether in such ancient times, as this of Moses, it may be justly doubted.

Wood and stone, silver and gold. Generally they 18 Lest there should be among you, man, or woman, or family, or tribe, whose heart turneth away this day from the Lord our God, to go and serve the gods of these nations; lest there should be among you a root that beareth gall and wormwood;

19 And it come to pass, when he heareth the words of this curse, that he bless himself in his heart, saying, I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart, to add drunkenness to thirst;

20 The Lord will not spare him, but then the anger of the Lord and his jealousy shall smoke against that man, and all the curses that are written in this book shall lie upon him, and the Lord shall blot out his name from under heaven.

And, to add drunkenness to thirst:] In the Hebrew the words are (as the margin of our Bibles observes) “the drunken to the thirsty;” for both words are adjectives, as grammarians speak; and supposing a substantive to support them, many think none so proper to be understood as the word earth. Which makes this a proverbial speech, “To add the wet to the dry, and the thirsty, or rather, “the thirsty to the wet.” For the particle both, which in the Hebrew is the note of the consecutive esse, is put before the word dry, or thirsty; and, therefore, that is the thing which is to be added to the wet or drunken: not the drunken to the dry. And the sense is, “draw others into the same wickedness,” just as if a drunken man should draw sober persons to the same; or, if a man be not a drunkard, to the same; or, if a man be not a drunkard, to the same.

There are a great many other Interpretations of these words (seven or eight) given by the Hebrew doctors, beside others in Christian writers; which may be seen in Cocceius, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 134. But this seems to be the most easy, at which the Chaldee aims, and the LXX. if the particle ὁμολογεῖν should draw sober persons to the same; or, if a man be not a drunkard, to the same.

Dr. Jackson, in his first book upon the Creed (ch. 30, parag. 4), thinks the meaning is, that posterity added to the wickedness of their ancestors. For they being east out of their good land for their infidelity and disobedience, their posterity (sith he) continue exiles and vagabonds for their stubbornness in like practices; not being willing, to this day, to offer up the sacrifice of a contrite heart for their disobedience past, but rather (adding thirst to drunkenness) “bless themselves when they hear the words of that curse, promising peace to themselves, though they walk on according to the stubbornness of their forefathers’ heart.”
21 And the Lord shall separate him unto evil out of all the tribes of Israel, according to all the curses of the covenant that are written in this book of the law:

22 So that the generation to come of your children shall rise up after you, and the stranger that shall come from a far land, shall say, when they see the plagues of that land, and the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon it:

23 And that the whole land thereof is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom, and Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim, which the Lord overthrew in his anger, and in his wrath:

24 Even all nations shall say, Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? what meaneth the heat of this great anger?

25 Then men shall say, Because they have forsaken the covenant of the Lord God of their fathers, which he made with them when he brought them forth out of the land of Egypt:

26 For they went and served other gods, and worshipped them, gods whom they knew not, and whom he had not given unto them:

27 And the anger of the Lord was kindled against this land, to bring upon it all the curses that are written in this book:

28 And the Lord rooted them out of their land in anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation, This was more exactly fulfilled in the last destruction of the Jews by the Romans than in their first by the Babylonians: for the whole land was laid waste, and deserted by its inhabitants, and made a den of thieves; being brought to desolation by repeated returns of wars, more especially in the time of Adonias, when Julius Severus, I. the forgoing chapter, made such a devastation, that the whole country was turned, in a manner, into a wilderness.

29 Even all nations shall say,] All that were near them, or came that way from far countries; as it goes before, ver. 24.

30 Wherefore hath the Lord done thus unto this land? Which he formerly made so populous and plenteous. What meaneth the heat of this great anger? These exceeding dreadful calamities, which evidently proceeded from a Divine vengeance. For the Jews fought so valiantly, and defended Jerusalem so resolutely (as appears by Josephus), that the author of Schelbet Judah had reason to say, That it was not want of arms, the unusual terror of new machines, but the anger of God, provoked by their wickedness, which was the true and only cause of their destruction. And, indeed, Titus himself said as much, That God fought for the Romans, and drove the Jews from their fortifications. Even wither et despiciens, &c. they which had the hands by new machines have done against such strong towers! (see ch. xxxii. 29).

31 This account must be supposed to be given by the pious Jews, or by those who were made sensible, when it was too late, how steadfast God was in his covenant; which contained curses as well as blessings, as was before observed, ver. 31, and see vii. 9, 10, xi. 26, 28.

32 They went and served other gods.] This aggravated their sin, that they sought for acquaintance with strange gods, directly contrary to the covenant of God (xii. 30, 31).

33 Whom he had not given unto them.] Or, as it is in the margin, had not given (or divided) to them as any portion; that he might shew any benefit upon them, as the Lord their God had done, who brought them out of Egypt. Or, more simply (as Boetius thinks the words will bear) to whom no worship belonged.”

34 So Moses foretold them, vii. 4, xi. 16, 17.

35 In anger, and in wrath, and in great indignation.] Here the word more to express his displeasure against them, than was used before, when he speaks of the destruction of Sodom, &c., ver. 23. And they all denote the great plagues threatened in Lev. xxvi. and in the foregoing chapter of this book.
nation, and cast them into another land, as it is this day.

29 The secret things belong unto the Lord

Cast them into another land.] This may seem to relate only to their captivity in Babylon; for, after they were rooted out by the Romans, they were scattered into all lands (xxviii. 63, 64). But considering what goes before (ver. 23, 24), and that they were not quite rooted out (many of them remaining in the land when Nebuchadnezzar compassed them,) till the desolation made by the Romans, I think these words relate to them also, and another land is only the singular number, as is usual, for the plural. And so the author of Schebet Judah understood it, who, quoting these words ("cast them out into another land"), adds, "which experience now proves to be true."

Ver. 29.] The Jews generally take these words to be meant of the punishment of secret sins (particularly of idolatry spoken of before, ver. 19), which belongeth unto God, as the punishment of open sins belonged unto them, in obedience to his law, who commanded them to put to death him that seduced any person to idolatry and to raise the city that apostatized into it (xiii. 5, 6, &c., 12, 13, &c.). And their negligence in doing their duty in this particular, made idolatry spread among them to their utter ruin. But these words may be understood as a farther answer to such inquiries, as that ver. 24, in which, if men persisted, and still asked, But why doth God thus punish his own people with such unusual severity, when there are many idolatrous nations, far worse than they, who continue still in their own land, and are not thus rooted out? Moses bids them silence such demands, and rest satisfied in this, That we cannot give an account of such things as God hath not revealed, particularly why he punishes some people, when he our God: but those things which are revealed belong unto us and to our children for ever, that we may do all the words of this law.

There may be also a more obvious sense of these words, if we translate them as some great men have done, "The secrets of the Lord our God are revealed to us, and to our children." Thus Onkelos, whose judgment is very valuable; which Grotius follows, and before him Försterus; and Paulus Fagius represents it as a commodious sense, and makes it the same with the words of the Psalmist, exlvii. 20, "He hath not dealt so with any nation." For this was a peculiar favour to the Jews, that those things which God before kept secret in his own breast he now manifested to them; that they might know how to order their lives so as to please him. But this made them liable to be punished more grievously than all other people, if they did not observe his will, which he most graciously discovered to them. And if we could give any credit to the Jews, who say that all words in the Bible that have extraordinary points upon them (of which there are but ten in the Pentateuch, and these words, lani ulebenu, "to us and our children," are the last of them), denote something peculiar and extraordinary, I should think that they relate to the revelation to be made by Jesus Christ, the great prophet promised to them (ch. xviii.); unto which, if they did not give heed, the most dreadful punishments would be inflicted on them; as we see they have been for many ages, and are not yet ended.

CHAPTER XXX.

1 Great mercies promised unto the repentant. 11 The commandment is manifest. 15 Death and life are set before them.

1 And it shall come to pass, when all these things are come upon thee, the blessing and the curse, which I have set before thee, and thou shalt call them to mind among all the nations, whither the Lord thy God hath driven thee, CHAP. XXX.

Ver. 1. When all these things are come upon thee,] God at the first bestowed great and singular blessings upon them; but when they grew so insensible of his mercy as to violate the covenant he had made with them, then he sent his curses which he had threatened upon them; which were completed in their expulsion out of the good land, which he had given them; especially in their last expulsion by the Romans, which was rather an extirpation.

Thou shalt call them to mind.] In the Hebrew, "bring back to thy heart," as we observe in the margin of 1 Kings viii. 47, where there is the very same phrase, and the same signification. "shall bethink thyself," that is, reflect seriously both upon the blessings and curses, and consequently consider the truth of God in fulfilling both. In which consideration, repentance and conversion to God begin (see Ezek. xviii. 28).

Among all the nations.] Where they could not choose but often think of all the blessings they had

2 And shalt return unto the Lord thy God, and shalt obey his voice according to all that I command thee this day, thou and thy children, with all thine heart, and with all thy soul;

3 That then the Lord thy God will turn thy enjoyed in their own land, and might have still enjoyed, if they had not been disobedient; and all the curses, which had befallen them till they were driven from thence, and had pursued them ever since (see Lev. xxvi. 40, &c.; Deut. iv. 29, 30, &c.).

Ver. 2.] Repentance was completed by forsaking their idols, and returning to the worship of the Lord their God alone, and by obeying all the rest of his commands, and teaching their children to do the same; and all this with sincerity of heart. This they did, in some measure, after they were carried captive to Babylon; since which time we read nothing of their idolatry. But they fell into other sins, which stopped their ears to that great prophet, the Lord Christ, when he came to them; for which they are punished to this day, and will be till they repent and obey.

Ver. 3. Will turn thy captivity.] That is, bring those that were carried captive back again to their own land. Thus the word captivity is used Ps. xiv. 7; Eph. iv. Have compassion upon thee.] These words express the spring of all their happiness, viz. the Divine compassion, in pardoning their sins, which had been very provoking.

Will return and gather thee] This is the effect of his repentance in their restoration, and re-collection again into one body after their dispersion. From all the nations, This was fulfilled in part when they returned from Babylon; for then they who were scattered in other countries fled back to them; and will be more completely fulfilled when they shall believe on our blessed Saviour. 4 And the Lord thy God will bring thee into most parts of heaven, from thence will the Lord thy God gather thee, and from thence will he fetch thee:

bitterly reproached the Lord Jesus and his religion. Abarbinel himself, though a gentleman of a noble family, a well-born person, and of an excellent understanding, is extremely guilty of this. And since that time Solomon himself, in the large and tend-the land which thy fathers possessed, and thou shalt possess it; and he will do thee good, and multiply thee above thy fathers.

6 And the Lord thy God will circumcise thine heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live.

7 And the Lord thy God will put all these curses upon thine enemies, and on them that hate thee, which persecuted thee.

8 And thou shalt return and obey the voice of the Lord, and do all his commands which I command thee this day.

9 And the Lord thy God will make thee GRECIANS, under whom they suffered very much, especially in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes; whose death did not conclude their troubles, as Hermannus Witsius hath shown at large, in his Dehephany, cap. 10, n. 9—13, &c., where he endeavours to prove that there was no moment of time, after their return from Babylon, wherein they could be said to be “made greater than their fathers,” especially in the days of David and Solomon: and therefore he concludes, that this promise is still to be completely fulfilled. And thus R. Isaac (in his book before named, Chissuk Ema) argues (Pereki. vi.), that God did not bestow benefits upon them equal to those which their fathers enjoyed, much less superior, while the second temple stood; but all that time was full of strait and calamities, for which he alleges the prophecy of Daniel ix. 25. And therefore saith, these words of Moses can by no means be thought to be fulfilled, when the tribes of Judah and Benjamin returned from Babylon, and left a vast number behind them, who would not come back with them, but stay there to this day.

Ver. 6. Circumcise thine heart.] By such singular benefits bestowed upon them in a miraculous manner, God designed to take away the stubborn refractoriness of their spirits (called “hardness of heart,” xxix. 19), and to cut off all their wicked inclinations and dispositions to idolatry and superstition, which had been their ruin; which is called “humbling their uncircumcised heart,” Lev. xxvi. 41. But though God circumcised them, yet their hearts might remain uncircumcised, as appears from xxxix. 3, 4. And therefore he calls upon them to circumcise their hearts themselves (xvi. 10), by laying to heart his benefits, and following the motions of his grace and holy Spirit, which thereby he put into their hearts: and their neglect of this, and resting merely in the circumcision of the flesh, was that which ruined them again.

The heart of thy seed.] Accordingly, we find they were freed from idolatry after their return from Babylon, though still they continued in other sins. Which brought this present captivity (as they call it) upon them; another banishment being necessary (saith R. Isaac, in the book before mentioned, Perek. vi.) to purge them from their sins, by the severe afflictions wherein their fathers,” especially long suffered, because their manifold sins, as he expresses it, need much scouring, by contusions and pressures. After which, he saith, they shall sin no more, but that shall be fulfilled which is written in the law, “the Lord thy God shall circumcise thine heart,” &c., quoting these very words of Moses. But, alas! they are not sensible of what sin they suffer (see p. 96, 97, of Wagrensell’s edition).

To love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, &c.] See vi. 5. This propheesy, the Jews say, shall be fulfilled in the days of the Messiah, according to what Ezekiel saith, xxxvi. 26, “A new heart will I give plenteous in every work of thine hand, in the fruit of thy body, and in the fruit of thy cattle, and in the fruit of thy land, for good: for the Lord will again rejoice over thee for good, as he rejoiced over thy fathers:

10 If thou shalt hearken unto the voice of the Lord thy God, to keep his commandments and his statutes which are written in this book of the law, and if thou turn unto the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul.

11 ¶ For this commandment which I command thee this day, it is not hidden from thee, neither is it far off.

12 It is not in heaven, that thou shouldest you, and a new spirit will I put into you,” &c. So R. Isaac, in the place above named, and in p. 83.

Ver. 7.] Their very restoration created them many enemies, whose hatred increased with their prosperity in their own land, and made them, when they had power, to persecute them. Whom God remarkably plagued, particularly Antiochus Epiphanes, who died in miserable torments.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt return] This may relate as well to their return unto their own land, as to their turning unto God: of both which he had spoken before. And now, having mentioned their persecution, whereby many of them might be driven out of their country, I suppose he here promises their restoration to it again, when he had cursed their enemies.

And obey the voice of the Lord.] Continue steadfast in their love to him, by a strict observance of all his commandments.

Ver. 9. Make thee plenteous in every work of thine hand, &c.] The effect of their constant and sincere obedience he promises should be still greater prosperity in all their undertakings, and in all their enjoyments (see xxviii. 4, 5, &c.).

For good.] To encourage them to continue faithful in the service of God.

The Lord will again rejoice over thee for good.] Delight only in blessing them; and not send any curses upon them (see xxviii. 53, and Jer. xxxii. 41).

As he rejoiced over thy fathers.] In whose obedience he delighted (Dent. x. 15).

Ver. 10. To keep his commandments, &c.] Persist in obedience to him.

If thou turn—[with all thine heart,] With a sincere love to all his commands (ver. 2), who laid “planted them assuredly in their land, with his whole heart, and his whole soul,” as Jeremiah speaks, xxxii. 41. But herein they were defective, after they came out of the captivity of Babylon. For though they never returned again to idolatry, but kept close to the worship of God alone, yet they rested merely in the outward rites of religion, and had not a hearty love to God and to all goodness; which made them reject the Son of God when he came among them, and fall under their long calamities which will not end till they “turn to him with all their hearts and souls.”

Ver. 11. For this commandment which I command thee this day,] Of hearty love to God, and sincere obedience to all his commands (ver. 2, 6, 8, 16.)

It is not hidden from thee.] Or it may be translated out of the Hebrew, “It is not too wonderful above thee,” that thou shouldest and hard to be understood, because above their reach; but easy to be known and acquainted withal, because plainly revealed. Which is as true of the gospel (unto which St. Paul applies these words, Rom. x. 6, &c.) as it was of the law of Moses: for therein our Saviour hath declared say, Who shall go up for us to heaven, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?

13 Neither is it beyond the sea, that thou shouldst say, Who shall go over the sea for us, and bring it unto us, that we may hear it, and do it?

14 But the word is very nigh unto thee, in thy mouth, and in thy heart, that thou mayest do it.

the mind and will of God to us, in such familiar words that the most simple people may understand their duty.

Neither is it for off.] So that they should go to seek it, and learn it in some distant nation. R. Isaac, in his Churah Esaia, cap. 4, had his thoughts so fixed upon what is said ver. 4, that he fancied these words belong to that matter; and that Moses still speaks to them of repentance, "which is of greater value than any other thing, and yet most easily acquired." Which cannot but make one wonder at their blindness; for if repentance be so very easy, how can there be occasion, that repentance depends on the confession of the mouth and grief of the heart? But the largest confession and the sorest grief will not avail them, till they repent of their crucifying the Lord Jesus, and shall "confess him with their mouth, and believe in their heart that God hath raised him from the dead," i.e., as St. Paul speaks, Rom. x. 9, 10.

Ver. 12.] R. Jacob Haesseni, in his preface to that part of the Mischna called Sanc Nanev, as God Vorstius observes upon Abarbanel about the Articles of their Faith), hath very fairly expounded this: which he takes to be a proverbial speech, to show that there is no need of hard, or rather impossible labour, to come at the knowledge of God's will, as there is in many human sciences, where the mind of man is tired by several passages of words, and as Grotes, &c., foresays, that he seeks at what he seeks: but all things are plain and easy to be understood, and not hard to be performed. For God had revealed his mind clearly by Moses from heaven, and therefore none had need to go thither to desire God to acquaint them with it, which he had done of his own accord, out of his good will towards them. And thus Grotes observes, upon the same passage, and this may be the reason, that they expressed things very difficult, by going up to heaven. Maimonides, indeed, to Jesodehatorah, cap. 9, and Abarbanel, in Rosch Amana, cap. 13, make these words an argument for the eternity and unchangeableness of their law, and that there should be no new revelation from heaven; but there is no colour for this from these words, the particle hu being of the feminine gender, and therefore doth not refer to God, but to the command before mentioned, plainly importing that men could not pretend ignorance of their duty, nor had any reason to desire that somebody would go to heaven again for those things which Moses had already brought from thence. And thus the apostle may justify these words to the new revelation from heaven by the Son of God, which was not abstruse and difficult, but as plain and perspicuous as this now made by Moses.

Ver. 13.] ἢ δεν δειδαὶ πολλονοιοι και χαματοιοι αὐχοδιμας (to use the words of Philo, in his book concerning Rewards and Punishments). so as to need long and tedious voyages, laborious and wearisome travels, to fetch it from foreign countries. Such as the Greek philosophers took, who travelled into Egypt, and the eastern part of the world, to learn wisdom, which God now taught his people in the wilderness, without any pains to attain it.

Ver. 14. The word is very nigh unto thee.] Being brought to their very doors by Moses, the servant of God; who now delivered to them the mind of God, as the Son of God himself did afterward, when he came and dwelt among them.

By thine mouth, and in thy heart.] Made so familiar to them, that they might wander, have it in their mouth, and discourse, to teach it their children; and had now been so often repeated, that it might be well laid up in their memory, never to be forgotten by them (vi. 6—9, xii. 18—20). It was also in the mouth of their priests, who were to teach them knowledge (Mal. ii. 7), and press it upon their hearts. Here the forenamed R. Isaac, in both the places forenamed, shows the priests to be the instrument of the confession of the mouth and grief of the heart; but the largest confession and the sorest grief will not avail them, till they repent of their crucifying the Lord Jesus, and shall "confess him with their mouth, and believe in their heart that God hath raised him from the dead," i.e., as St. Paul speaks, Rom. x. 9, 10.

Ver. 15.] "Life and good, death and evil," may be but two words for the same thing, viz., all manner of happiness, and all manner of misery; both which he had at large set before them in the twenty-eighth chapter. Or by life may be meant long life in the land God had promised them; and good, all the prosperity they could wish for there: as, on the other side, death may mean death in the wilderness, and in land of the living before their time; and evil, all the calamities he had threatened while they lived: and so the next verse seems to interpret it. Maimonides from these words observes, that the wills of men are under no force nor coercion, but are free agents; and therefore have precepts imposed upon them, with a punishment threatened to the disobedient, and a reward promised to those who keep God's commandments. Of which he treats at large in his preface to his Commentary upon Pirke Avoth, cap. 8.

Ver. 16. To walk in his ways, &c.] This includes their entire obedience to all God's laws, which are comprehended under these three names (see vi. 1, 5, vii. 11, x. 12, 15.
will not hear, but shalt be drawn away, and worship other gods, and serve them;

18 I denounce unto you this day, that ye shall surely perish, and that ye shall not prolong your days upon the land, whither thou passest over Jordan to go to possess it.

19 I call heaven and earth to record this day against you, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing: therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live:

20 That thou mayest love the Lord thy God, and that thou mayest obey his voice, and that thou mayest cleave unto him: for he is thy life, and the length of thy days: that thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, to give them.

That thou mayest live and multiply:] This is the explication of the life and good which he set before them, if they observed God's laws with sincere affection to them (ver. 15).

Ver. 17. But if thine heart turn away.] Want of love to God, and of a due esteem of his wonderful love to them, made their heart turn away to other things, and not regard what he had revealed to them from heaven.

And worship other gods, and serve them:] This was the principal breach of the covenant of God.

Ver. 18.] This is the explication of the death and evil he set before them (ver. 15).

Ver. 19. I call heaven and earth to record this day against you.] God, angels, and men, were witnesses that he had done his duty. See iv. 26, viii. 19, and therefore is owned by God himself to be faithful in all his house. (Numb. xii. 7.)

Blessing and cursing:] They are the same with life and death; but he uses several words, to make them sensible that both proceeded from God; the one being the effect of his love and favour, and the other of his anger and high displeasure.

Therefore choose life.] That is, choose to be obedient, without which they could not be happy. Or he wishes them to set their hearts on the happiness God had promised them, that it might incline them to do as follows.

Ver. 20. That thou mayest love the Lord thy God.] Love is the noblest and the strongest spring of obedience.

Cleave unto him:] Obedience to God is the surest preservative from apostasy.

He is thy life.] The author and giver of life; which he preserves and prolongs unto these who are obedient.

That thou mayest dwell in the land which the Lord sware unto thy fathers:] Which promise confirmed by an oath being faithfully fulfilled, he justly claimed their fidelity to him upon that account: which is the reason it is so often mentioned (vi. 10, viii. 1, ix. 5, x. 11, xi. 9, 21, xix. 8).

CHAPTER XXXI.

1 Moses encourageth the people. 7 He encourageth Joshua. 9 He delivereth the law unto the priests to read it in the seventh year to the people. 14 God giveth a charge to Joshua, 19 and a song to testify against the people.

24 Moses delivereth the book of the law to the Levites to keep. 28 He maketh a protestation to the elders.

And Moses went and spake these words unto all Israel.

2 And he said unto them, I am an hundred and twenty years old this day; and I can no more go out and come in: also the Lord hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan.

And twenty years old this day; I can no more go out and come in: also the Lord hath said unto me, Thou shalt not go over this Jordan.

CHAP. XXXXI.

Ver. 1.] By this it seems plain to me, that after Moses had renewed the covenant with the people (mentioned in the foregoing chapter), he dismissed them, and retired to his own tent. But not long after gave them a new summons (as he had done xxxix. 2), and went again to take his leave of them. The LXX. indeed seem to take the first words, as if the meaning was, that he went on with his discourse. For thus they render them, συνελήφθη δὲ καὶ ἦσαν τοῖς ποιοὶς τούτους, "he finished speaking to all these words." For which I see no warrant, nor is it likely he could speak all that here follows at the same time.

Ver. 2. I am an hundred and twenty years old this day.] This shows these words were spoken not long before his death, which was this year (xxxiv. 7). Manasses ben Israel would have us from hence observe, "The singular care God hath of those who serve him with a perfect heart, as Moses did; the days of whose years (saith he) are exactly proportioned. For so these words are expounded in Sot. cap. 1. 'To-day my years are completed; to-day I was born, and to-day I shall die;' for he was born on the seventh day of the month Adar, and on the same day of the same month he died. Thus Enoch (he adds) lived just three hundred and sixty-five years, which are proportioned to the days of the sun's annual course," lib. iii. De Termino Vite, sect. 5. But as there is no great weight in this observation, if it were true, so that which he saith of Moses is evidently false: for he did not die this very day, as appears from ver. 14, where he saith, "Thy days approach that thou must die." Therefore the time was not yet come.

I can no more go out and come in:] Discharge the office I have long sustained of your governor and leader (see Numb. xxvii. 17); not because he wanted vigour, either of body or mind (for that is contrary to xxxiv. 7, of this book), but because God did not think fit to permit him to conduct them any farther; as the following words explain it.

Also the Lord hath said unto me:] The particle we translate also, often signifies for: and is so translated by us in divers places; particularly in Isa. iii. 7, Jer. xvii. 8. And being so taken here, the sense of these words is plain and easy; giving a reason why he could no longer take the charge of them, as he had done, because God had otherwise ordered; having told him 'he should not bring them into Canaan, which they were now ready to enter.
CHAPTER XXXI.

3 The Lord thy God, he will go over before thee, and he will destroy these nations from before thee, and thou shalt possess them: and Joshua, he shall go over before thee, as the Lord hath said.

4 And the Lord shall do unto them as he did to Sihon and to Og, kings of the Amorites, and unto the land of them, whom he destroyed.

5 And the Lord shall give them up before your face, that ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments which I have commanded you.

6 Be strong and of a good courage, fear not, nor be afraid of them: for the Lord thy God, Ver. 3. He will go over before thee.] Conduct them by the ark of his presence (Josh. iii. 5, 11, and see Exod. xxiii. 23, and Deut. ix. 3.

Will destroy these nations] Exod. xxxiv. 11.

And Joshua, he shall go over before thee.] As the captain and leader when Moses had left them (iii. 28, 30).

As the Lord hath said.] When he was appointed the successor of Moses (Num. xxvii. 18, 21).

Ver. 4.] See Num. xxiv. 24, 34, 35.

Ver. 5. The Lord shall give them up before your face.] As he had promised before, vii. 23, where he saith, “The Lord thy God shall deliver them unto thee.”

For in the Hebrew the words are, “before thy face” (see ix. 3).

That ye may do unto them according unto all the commandments] i. e. Utterly destroy them, and their altars, and images, and groves, &c. (see vii. 2, 3, 5, 27, xili. 1, 2, &c.).

Ver. 6. Be strong and of a good courage.] By faith in God; which their forefathers wanting, were discouraged, and durst not go up and possess the land when God commanded them (i. 25, 32).

Fear not, nor be afraid of them.] Be not affrighted, much less dismayed at their multitude, their stature and strength, when you go to fight with them. The second word (afraid) only expresses a higher degree of the same passion of fear; signifying, being overcome with it. For that is the common use of the Hebrew word aratz, which originally signifies to prevail over another. This he had said to their forefathers, i. 21, 29, and after repeated to them, iii. 2, 22, vii. 17, 18, 21.

He it is that doth go with thee.] According to the assurance before given them (xx. 4).

He will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.] This promise, which here is general, in the next verse but one is particularly made to Joshua; and renewed to him by God himself, after the death of Moses, when they were about to enter into the land of Canaan (Josh. i. 5). And it is applied by the apostle unto all faithful Christians, to encourage their hope of being conducted through all difficulties and dangers unto their heavenly inheritance (Heb. x. 5).

Ver. 7. Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel.] That they might have the greater reverence to his person and authority, and follow his conduct, as a leader appointed by God.

Be strong] He exhorts him to give a good example to all the people; these being the same words he had spoken to them, ver. 6.

For thou must go with this people] Be their leader and commander-in-chief, by God’s special order, (Num. xxvii. 21).

Unto the land] See viii. 1, x. 13, xxx. 20.

Cause them to inherit it.] Put them into possession of it (iii. 29).

he it is that doth go with thee: he will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.

7 ¶ And Moses called unto Joshua, and said unto him in the sight of all Israel, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou must go with this people unto the land which the Lord hath sworn unto their fathers to give them; and thou shalt cause them to inherit it.

8 And the Lord, he it is that doth go before thee: he will be with thee, he will not fail thee, neither forsake thee: fear not, neither be dismayed.

9 ¶ And Moses wrote this law, and delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi, which bare Ver. 8. He it is that doth go before thee.] Josh. i. 9.

He will not fail thee.] See ver. 6.

Fear not, neither be dismayed.] The same which he said to the people, ver. 6, but was most necessary to be pressed upon him, who, by his unsanctified resolution, was to put courage into them. The word fear do not translate the Hebrew word mikra, in the LXX. and the Vulgar use the same word to express both; which denotes such a consternation, as disables a man to do his duty; which is the proper import of this word.

Ver. 9. Moses wrote this law] Some understand by this law, only the book of Deuteronomy; for which I can see no reason, the Scripture calling all that is contained in the five books of Moses by the name of the law. St. Paul, for instance, in Gal. iii. 21, asks this question, “Do you not hear the law?” and then quotes what we read in Gen. xvi. 21. And so Nehemiah saith, x. 34, 35, that they brought first-fruits unto God, “as it is written in the law,” viz. Exod. xiii. 2, xiii. 19. And Josiah put away the workers with familiar spirits, &c. “that he might perform the words of the law” (2 Kings xxiv. 24), which we find Lev. xix. 30, xx. 6, 27. And Hezekiah also (2 Chron. xxxi. 3) appointed the daily oblations, and those required at stated times, to be offered, “as it is written in the law of the Lord,” which plainly refers to the laws of Moses, chap. xxv. See this in the parallel passage. At that time Joshua built an altar on Mount Ebal (viii. 30, 31), “as it is written in the book of the law of Moses;” which we find nowhere but in this book of Deuteronomy (xxvii. 4).

Delivered it unto the priests the sons of Levi.] Concerning this form of speech “the priests the sons of Levi,” see xvi. 9. It is probable Moses had written most of these five books some time ago (and so the foregoing words may be translated, “Moses had written this law,” but did not finish them till a little before his death, and then delivered them to the priests. But there is no necessity thus to understand it, for he might have had time enough between this and his death to write the whole Pentateuch; it being only said, ver. 19, “The book of the law;” which must die;” which does not imply he was to die in a day or two, but there might be some weeks before his departure.

Which bare the ark] It was most proper to deliver it unto them, who alone might touch the ark, in which this law was to be laid (ver. 20). The Kohathites were to carry the ark in their travels through the wilderness, after the priests had covered it, and put in the staves thereof (as I have shown Numb. iv. 5, 6, &c.), but it is evident they served only as ministers to the priests, who, upon great occasions, bare the ark themselves. As when they passed over Jordan 4 G the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and unto all the elders of Israel.

10 And Moses commanded them, saying, At the end of every seven years, in the solemnity of the year of release, in the feast of tabernacles, 11 When all Israel is come to appear before the Lord thy God in the place which he shall choose, thou shalt read this law before all Israel in their hearing.

12 Gather the people together, men, and women, and children, and thy stranger that is within thy gates, that they may hear, and that they may learn, and fear the Lord your God, and observe to do all the words of this law:

which, if and that, he cares in the time of the Buxtorf, and it is said the Levites bare it; but at the same time the priests also were summoned to take care of it. The Levites bare it as their servants (1 Chron. xv. 2, 11, 13—15).

unto all the elders of Israel.] As he delivered this book of the law, that is, the whole Pentateuch (as Ababilin and others of the Jews understand it) unto the priests, commanding them to preserve it safe near the ark (ver. 24); so he delivered another copy of this book to the elders of every tribe, as the Jews affirm in Debarim Rabba; where they say (and it is highly probable) that Moses, before his death, wrote thirteen copies of the law (with his own hand as they add), and having delivered one unto the priests, to be preserved in the holy place, gave one to each tribe, which he committed to the care of the elders of it. Thus Maimonides, also, in his preface to Jad, Chazakah, as Buxtorf observes, in Histor. Aree Federis, cap. 5.

The intent of which was, I suppose, that all the people of each tribe might resort to it (as the whole nation were to resort to that in the sanctuary), if they doubted of any thing, which might be thought to be amiss, by the errors of transcribers.

Ver. 10. Moses commanded them; Both the priests and Levites, of which a notice is here made.

End of every seven years.] Mentioned, xv. 1, &c.

In the feast of tabernacles.] When they had gathered in all the fruits of the earth, and thereby had greater leisure to attend to the hearing of the law read to them; which, when men's minds were also freed from cares by the release of their debts, was likely to make a better impression on them.

Ver. 11. When all Israel is come to appear before the Lord.] As they were bound to do at this feast, and at Pentecost, and the passover (xvi. 16).

Thou shalt read this law before all Israel.] This order being directed, not to all Israel, but to a particular person, plainly imports, that the supreme governor, whoever he was, had this charge laid upon him, to take care these laws should be read at this solemn time, that all the people might hear them; and therefore, I think the Jews rightly say, that their kings, when they had them, were bound not only to look after this matter, but to read the law themselves to as many (that is) as could hear them, appointing the priests and the Levites to read it in as many other assemblies of the people as was necessary for fulfilling of this precept. In order to which, a pulpit was set up in the court of the men of Israel on the very first day of the feast (for they did not think fit to defer it till the last, because it is here said, "when Israel is come to appear before the Lord," not when they were ready to depart, as the Jews observe); the king going up into it, the minister in the book of the law, and delivered it to the ruler of the synagogue, who gave it to the sagan (or vicar of the high-priest), who delivered it to the high-priest, and he to the king; who stood up to receive it, and then sat down to read. All this expresses the reverence with which this holy book was delivered; and likewise the reverence with which they approached to the king; who, they say, began to read at this book of Deuteronomy (which is a compendium of the law), and proceeded, before he stopped, to those words (vi. 1), "Hear, O Israel," &c. which having also read, he omitted the rest till he came to ch. xi. 13.

And it shall come to pass, when all elders of Israel shall be gathered in the place which the Lord shall choose, that seven Levites, &c. reading on to ver. 22. And then skipped to xiv. 2, "And thou shalt truly tithe," &c. reading on to the section concerning the king (xvii. 14), and then the cursings and blessings out of the twenty-seventh and twenty-eighth chapters, till he had ended all that section of the law. Thus the Mishna, in the title Sota, cap. 7, sect. 8, which Wagenseil hath hitherto illustrated with the best learned annotations; and our Dr. Lightfoot also hath given an account of it long ago, in his Temple Service, ch. 17, sect. 1, where he saith, the king might sit down if he pleased, when he read, but it was esteemed more honourable if he stood: as king Agrippa did when he performed this office. And before he began to read, he made a prayer to God; and all this (he adds) was done "in the court of the women." Which well agrees with what is said in the next verse, "Gather the people, men and women," &c. But it doth not contradict what I said before, of his reading it in the court of the men of Israel; for if the king were of the family of David, it was always done there; if he were not, then in the court of the women, as Wagenseil observes out of Maimonides.

Ver. 12. Gather the people together.] All that came to this feast could not meet in one place, but were divided into several assemblies, probably in their synagogues. For as many as the courts of Israel would hold meeting there, it is reasonable to think that the rest assembled in some other holy place. And it was not always in synagogues, which Philo (in his book of the embassy to Caius) calls "places of secondary holiness." And Maimonides discourses at large of the holiness of synagogues and schools in his book of Prayer and the Priests' Blessing, cap. 11, (see upon Lev. xix. 30).

Men, and women, and children.] Though the males only were bound to go up to the great feasts, yet many devout women went also voluntarily, as appears by Hannah, I Sam. i. 3, 4. And all the women in Jerusalem were likewise bound to attend at these solemnities, with the children who were capable of instruction (see Neh. viii. 2, 3). To whom, and at whom, authority read the law in their court, while the king and the high-priest and David were reading it in the court of the men of Israel.

Thy stranger.] Such as were proselytes to the Jewish religion; not exceeding those who were only proselytes of the gate, if they were to come to their assemblies.

That they may hear, &c. That by this means they might be instructed in the true way of worshipping God (which is here called his fear), and to his worship and service add a careful obedience to all that he commanded in this book, which they might read (and were bound to do so) in their own private houses, and which they heard read every Sabbath-day in their public synagogues. For which, indeed, there is no particular command in the law; but they being commanded to teach their children every day at home the 13 And that their children, which have not known any thing, may hear, and learn to fear the Lord your God, as long as ye live in the land whither ye go over Jordan to possess it.

14 ¶ And the Lord said unto Moses, Behold, thy days approach that thou must die: call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle of the congregation, that I may give him a charge. And Moses and Joshua went, and presented themselves in the tabernacle of the congregation.

15 And the Lord appeared in the tabernacle things contained in the law, and consequently to read it (vi. 7, 8, xi. 16), they thought it most reasonable to have it read on the Sabbath in their public assemblies, where some portion of the law was read; but now the whole volume, as an authentic testimony of the whole nation, to the truth of what is contained in these books.

Ver. 13. That their children.] For the early instruction of posterity in the sacred authority of this law.

May hear, and learn to fear, &c.] Be preserved in the true religion, by so solemn an acknowledgment made by the king himself, that God delivered all these laws to Moses. Accordingly we find that Joshua, their supreme governor after the death of Moses, did read all the words of the law, not omitting a word that Moses had written, before the congregation, with women, and the little ones, and the strangers, that were conversant among them (Josh. viii. 34, 35).

But from that time to the reign of Jehoshaphat, (2 Chron. xvii. 7, 8, &c.) which is commonly computed to be five hundred and thirty years, we find no mention of a public reading of it. Nor from that time to the thirteenth year of Josiah, (2 Chron. xxx. 31,) which was the space of two hundred eighty and two years; nor from that time till after the captivity of Babylon (Neh. viii. 2, 3, &c.). By which neglect they more easily fell into idolatry, and continued in it, more or less, till that captivity; for a forgetfulness of the law ensued upon this neglect.

Ver. 14. Behold, thy days approach that thou must die.] He divined to himself, that the end of his days upon earth was near, when he must resign up his office into the hands of Joshua, who had been before appointed his successor (Numb. xxvii.).

Call Joshua, and present yourselves in the tabernacle—that I may give him a charge.] This was done, I suppose, in the face of all the people, to whom Moses had been speaking (ver. 1, 2), to give Joshua the greater authority, and to make him reverenced by them, when they saw he was appointed by God himself to be their governor; as he had been before ordained publicly by God's order (Numb. xxvii. 18, 19, &c.).

And Moses and Joshua went.] In the court of the sanctuary, with their faces towards it; for it was not lawful for any but the priests to go into the sanctuary itself. Some indeed have thought, that by a special order from God, Joshua was now admitted into it: but this seems to me to be contradicted by the next verse, which saith God appeared in a cloud over the door of the tabernacle.

Ver. 15. The Lord appeared] This signifies, that the glory of the Lord (as other places speak) appeared unto them, and unto the people, as it had done upon many occasions (Exod. xxxvii. 9, 10; Numb. ix. 15, xvi. 42, 43).

The pillar of the cloud stood over the door] Being a symbol of the Divine presence, whose glory appeared out of the cloud, as it did Numb. xvi. 42. For the cloud was always upon the tabernacle (Exod. xl. 35, 38; Numb. ix. 15), but when the Lord would strike an awe into the people, and move them to regard what he said or did, then the cloud stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the glory of the Lord came out of the most holy place, and appeared in it.

Ver. 16. The Lord said unto Moses.] Out of the cloud, I suppose, as he did, Numb. xvi. 44.

Behold, thou shalt sleep with thy fathers:] He first accomplishment Moses signified by these words. In the audience, I suppose, of Joshua, who heard all the following admonition, to make him more carefully observe the end and design of it.

Sleep is a common word for death, either of good men or bad; which was not used merely as a soft expression of that which the heathen dreaded as the most terrible of all things; but to put them in mind, perhaps, that death should not last always, but they should as certainly rise again, as they lay down (so the word is in the Hebrew) to sleep with their fathers.

This people will rise] In rebellion.

Go a whoring.] God, who searches all men's hearts, discovered such a spirit in the hearts of these people, that he knew they would fall into idolatry (which is called "going a whoring") from him, as hath been often noted notwithstanding all the means he had prescribed to prevent it. And therefore he adds one more, which was the learning them the following song; notwithstanding which, he foresaw, that after the death of Joshua, and the elders who survived him, they would forsake him, and worship other gods and the works of their own hands. They may have observed, that in the text (Judg. vi. 36, 38),

After the gods of the strangers] This is an unusual phrase, signifying no more than what he calls in other places strange gods. Though some think it imports peculiarly the gods of the Canaanites, who were the former inhabitants, but, being expelled, became "strangers of the land." And thus Onkelos seems to have understood it, who translates it: "after the idols of the people of the land." Which was a high aggravation of their sin, that they should worship such gods as had not been able to protect their servants.

Whither they go to be among them.] This seems to countenance the foregoing exposition. And God charges them in future ages with this, as a very great guilt, that they worshipped their idols of the Amorites, in whose land they dwelt (Judg. vi. 10).

Will forsake me.] For he looked upon himself as forsaken (that is, not worshipped), if they worshipped any other god with him (Exod. xx. 3).

Break my covenant.] This being the principal thing in the covenant (as I have often observed), that they should worship him alone (Exod. xx. 22, 23, xxix. 32, 33; Deut. v. 24, &c., vi. 3, 4, &c.).

Ver. 17. My anger shall be kindled against them in that day.] So we read it was upon their very first apostasy to idolatry (Judg. ii. 14), and continued so in all ages, as we read frequently in that and the following books (see there, ver. 20, and ill. 8, &c.). I will forsake them.] Go no longer before them devoured, and many evils and troubles shall befall them; so that they will say in that day, Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us?

18 And I will surely hide my face in that day from all the evils which they shall have wrought, in that they are turned unto other gods.
19 Now therefore write ye this song for you, and teach it the children of Israel: put it in their mouths, that this song may be a witness for me against the children of Israel.
20 For when I shall have brought them into the land which I sware unto their fathers, that floweth with milk and honey; and they shall have eaten and filled themselves, and waxen fat; then will they turn unto other gods, and serve them, and provoke me, and break my covenant.
21 And it shall come to pass, when many evils and troubles are befallen them, that this song shall testify against them as a witness; for it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed: for I know their imagination which they go about, even now, even before I have brought them into the land which I sware.

against their enemies, but deliver them up into their hands (ver. 8).

Will hide my face from them.] Withdraw my favour and protection. So that they were devoured, as it follows, by their enemies, and wild beasts; and "many evils and troubles beset them;" or, as the Hebrew phrase signifies, "came upon them on a sudden." The prophet Ezekiel expresses this in these words, "My face will I turn from them" (vii. 22). The effect of this was, the Divine presence departed out of the sanctuary, and he left it (as he there speaks) to be polluted and defiled by robbers. And so it here follows.

Are not these evils come upon us, because our God is not among us?] For whithersoever they went out, "the hand of the Lord was against them for evil;" as we read Judg. ii. 15, which was so remarkable a change, that it could not but at last make them reflect upon the cause of it; as we find it did, and moved them to cry unto the Lord for help (iii. 9, 15, iv. 3, &c.).

Ver. 13. I will surely hide, &c.] He repeats it again, because they were a people dullest of hearing. Or the former words may relate to their first captivity, and these to the last (as they call it), wherein they now are. For they themselves take notice, that these words have been fulfilled by the many calamities which have befallen them since the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. This appears from Schebet Judah, where Solomon Virgæ quotes this very verse, to prove that their present sufferings proceed not from nature, but from an angry God, more powerful than man, in verses 2, 3, sect. 12.

Ver. 19. Now therefore write ye] This shows these words were directed both to Moses and to Joshua, who was to take care, after Moses's death, to see this command observed.

This song for you,] Which follows in the thirtysixth chapter.

Teach it the children of Israel.] Make them get it by heart, as we now speak.

Put it in their mouths,] That they might sing it, and thereby preserve it in their memory. For it hath been always thought the most profitable way of instructing people, and communicating things to posterity, by putting them into verse; and especially children and young people. So the great reason why, at any rate, the female, should be bound to instruct the whole city to sing such songs, and never cease so to do," &c. (see Eusebius, lib. xii. Prepar. Evang. 32). And Plato himself, lib. ii. De Legibus; where he gives a great many cautions about this matter, and concludes that ἄνδρον ἐν Θεῷ, ἡ θρονία τινα, ἄν ἐχηκο, ὃς ἐν τῷ ἐκεί, p. 557, "this must be the work of a god, or some wise man."

As if he had been acquainted with what Moses, the man of God, or rather God himself, here ordained, that every one should have this song in their mouths, as a means to preserve them in the worship of God alone. However, this justifies the admirable discipline of the Hebrews in those ancient times, who were taught by such y犬anes and wise men, that they never thought the best way of instruction. For which reason, as Aristotle reports in his Problems (sect. 19, prob. 23), people anciently sung their laws, as the Agathyrisle (he saith) continued to do in his days, οὔτως μὴ ἰκτυλεύοντα, "that they might not be forgotten." Particularly the laws of Charrondas (as Athenæus informs us out of Hermippus) were wont not to be sung at Athens, ἄνω αὐτων, "over a glass of wine;" and were therefore written in some sort of verse, or tunable measure, as our incomparable Dr. Bentley hath made it probable, in his late Dissertation on the Epistles of Phalaris, p. 373. Tully also (as he addeth no more) tells us, that Cato, in his book De Originibus, reports, that it was the custom among the old Romans, to have the verses and praises of famous men sung to a pipe at their feasts; which he thinks they learnt from the ancient Pythagoreans in Italy, who were wont, "carminibus praecipta quadam occultius tradere, "to deliver in verses certain precepts," which were the greatest secrets in their philosophy; and composed the minds of the scholars to tranquillity, by songs and instruments of music. See upon Numb. xxii. 30, 31. Here is a kind of instruction to the Pythagoreans and Pythagoreans, that this song may be a witness for me.] Testifying that they were sufficiently warned, and could not complain that they were not taught their duty and told their danger; and reproving also their ingratitude, and putting them in mind bow ill they requited their God (ver. 21).

Ver. 20. For when I shall have brought them into the land which I sware] See vi. 10, &c., xv. 8, 9. Shall have eaten, &c.] See vii. 10—12, &c., xxvii. 15. Then will they turn unto other gods, &c.] Against which he had most solemnly forewarned them, in the places before mentioned, and xi. 16, xii. 29, 30.

Ver. 21. This song shall teach.] That they are not to be punished for their foul ingratitude and unbelief, with which this song upbraided them; having told them plainly (xxxii. 18, 19) what would be the effect of their forsaking him; and at the delivery of it, God having solemnly said here (ver. 17), that when they went a whoring from him he would " forsake them, and hide his face from them;" it shall not be forgotten out of the mouths of their seed:] The calamities which fell upon them, according to what is predicted in this song, brought it to their remembrance when they had forgotten it, or did not regard it. For these words do not seem to be a precept requiring them to remember this song, but a CHAPTER XXXI.

22 ¶ Moses therefore wrote this song the same day, and taught it the children of Israel.

23 And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge, and said, Be strong and of a good courage: for thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land which I sware unto them: and I will be with thee.

24 ¶ And it came to pass, when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this law in a book, until they were finished, 25 That Moses commanded the Levites, prediction, foretelling that their miseries should not suffer them quite to forget it.

For I know their imagination] He saw the secret inclinations and designs which were in their hearts; and perceived that, at a very present they banked, as we speak, after idols.

Ver. 22. Moses therefore wrote this song] And so did Joshua (as he was commanded, ver. 19), who spake the words of this song unto the people as well as Moses, xxxii. 44.

And taught it the children of Israel.] Commanded them to sing it (ver. 19). In order to which, the Jews say, every man was bound to write for himself a copy of it: and more than that, they make it one of the affirmative precepts (as Maimonides tells us), which obliged every Israelite to write out the whole book of the law with his own hand. For so they interpret those words (ver. 19), "Write ye this song for you," as if they were spoken to all the people; and their meaning had been, "Write ye this law for you, wherein is this song;" for they were not to write the law by small parts and sections (as his words are), but all of it entirely. And if a man's parents had left him a copy, yet he was bound to write one himself; or if he could not write, to procure one to be written for him by some other person, &c. (see Schickard's Mischpah Hammachach, cap. 2, theor. 5).

Ver. 23. He gave Joshua— a charge.] That is, the Lord, who had hitherunto spoken to him by Moses, now spake to him himself, and gave him this charge, to gain him the greater authority. For which end he had ordered Joshua to present himself before him, together with Moses (ver. 11).

He gave Joshua— a charge.¶ Which he repeats to him after the death of Moses, Josh. i. 6, 7. Thou shalt bring the children of Israel into the land] I have appointed thee to be the captain of my people, to lead them into the land of Canaan.

I will be with thee.] To give him success in all his enterprises. Which words being spoken in the audience of all the people (as may be supposed in ver. 11), made them readily submit to the authority of Joshua, and confide in his conduct.

Ver. 24. The whole book of the laws, which he put together before his death; as I said on ver. 9.

Ver. 25. The priests, who were of the tribe of Levi (see ver. 26), to copy this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark. Not in the inside of it: for he doth not say, "put it into the ark," but "in the side of the ark," that is, on the outside, in a little box, as Jonathan and others expound it. For it is the very same phrase with that, 1 Sam. vi. 8, where the Philistines are said to have put the jewels of gold which they took away, "in the side of the ark," where none could put it but the high-priest, because nobody else might go into the holy place where the ark was. And therefore those priests who received the book of the law from Moses delivered it to Eleazar, to be there placed. See Buxtorf. Histor. Vol. I.— 114.

which bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord, saying,

26 Take this book of the law, and put it in the side of the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, that it may be there for a witness against thee.

27 For I know thy rebellion, and thy stiff neck: behold, while I am yet alive with you this day, ye have been rebellious against the Lord; and how much more after my death?

28 ¶ Gather unto me all the elders of your race, cap. 5, and Huetius, more lately, in his De demonstratio Evangelica, propos. iv. cap. De Can. Libr. Sacrorum, sect. 8, where he observes that R. Mei, in both ths of Joshua, when it was casually found in the house of God, as they were about the reparations of it: though I cannot say they found it in the side of the ark, but rather upon the roof of the house, or in the rafters; where the priests had hid it, as some of the Jews think, when Manasseh endeavoured to destroy this authentic copy of the law, as he had done all other that he could find; and when they came to uncover the house, there it appeared.

Ver. 27. For I know thy rebellion.¶ I have been sufficiently acquainted with your perverse disposition. Behold, while I am yet alive, &c.] For it was not likely that they would have a greater regard to Joshua than they had to him, who had such near familiarity with God, as never any man had.

Ver. 28. Gather unto me all the elders of your race, etc.] I suppose after Moses had spoken to the people what God ordered, ver. 1, 2, &c. (see there), he dismissed them again, that he might write the book of the law (ver. 9), and deliver it to the priests, &c., and then write this song (which follows in the next chapter), ver. 19, 22, &c., which being done, he is ordered here to summon all the elders of the several tribes (and with them all the people came, ver. 30), that he might deliver to them, by word of mouth, the song which he had written.

Your officers.] I have frequently observed that these shoterim (which we translate officers) were but ministers to their elders or judges (see Exod. xiv. 14; Deut. i. 15, xx. 19). Into which, I shall add here only the words of Arbabelin: The office of the shoterim was to see that the sentence which the judges had given was observed, and to compel men to it. They who would have more may find a long roll of authors, who are of this mind, both Jews and Christians, tribes, and your officers, that I may speak these words in their ears, and call heaven and earth to record against them.

29 For I know that after my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, and turn aside from the way which I have commanded you; and in Jo. Benedic. Carpozovius upon Schickard's Jus Regium; who hath also said a great deal to the same purpose, cap. 4, theor. 14.

That I may speak these words] The song which God had suggested to him, and commanded him to write (ver. 19, 29). Call the whole world to witness how wicked they are, if they fall from God, after such care to preserve them in his obedience.

Ver. 29. After my death ye will utterly corrupt yourselves, Call to the foulest idoltry (Judg. ii. 19).

And turn aside] Departing from that way of God which I have delivered to you by this command. It was a very melancholy thing for Moses to leave the world in this belief, that all his pains would be lost upon them; but he comforted himself in doing his duty to the very last, and omitting no means to secure them from apostasy.

Evil will befall you in the latter days,] This seems to express a foresight, that they would not immediately revolt, but after the death of Joshua, and of the elders who survived him (Judg. ii. 7, 11, 12, &c.).

Because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord,] By making images, after the manner of other nations, and bowing down to them, and worshiping them, Judg. ii. 12, 13, ill. 7, where the groves signify the images in the groves.

Ver. 30. Moses spoke] With the assistance of Joshua, xxxii. 44.

In the ears of all the congregation] Whom the elders and officers (ver. 28) had assembled, according to their tribes and families; unto whom they went several, and spake these words in their hearing.

The words of this song,] Which follows in the next chapter, and much differs, in the raised expressions and loftiness of the style, from the rest of this book hitherto.

Until they were ended,] Omitted nothing, but completely delivered this song to them; or they spake all these words to them, at the same time, with one continued speech. I observed before that the most ancient way of construction was by poetical compositions, which was more ancient than rhetorical discourses. And as their chief learning did consist of poetry, so the excellency of their poetry was seen in the proper and native subject of this faculty, that is, in matters of sacred use or observation: from whence the title of satae descended unto secular and profane poets, who retained the matter of speech used by the former. But, as Conradus Pellicanus here truly observes (and see my notes on Exod. xv. 1), the Scripture poetry doth not consist in the cadency and number of syllables, contrived to please the ear, but in brief and weighty sentences, simply and sincerely composed, that lively manner, to enlighten the understandings, move the affections, and stick in the memory. And the ancients (as a great man of our own observes) had this advantage of later poets, "That the fashion of the world (as he speaks), in their times, was more apt to ravish their thoughts with admiration; wonderful events being then more frequent, and their frequency not abating, but rather increasing their wonderment, because their variety was very great, and the apprehension of invisible or supernatural powers in those events was usual and undoubtedly. So that admiration was then enforced upon men, and the breasts of those who diligently observed those events, or were any way disposed by nature to it, were inspired with lively and sublime affections, apt to vest themselves in such poetical phrases and resemblances as we cannot reach, unless we raise our invention by imitation, and stir up admiration by meditation and study. But now our senses being neither moved by such extraordinary effects of God's power, nor our minds bent to observe the ways of his wisdom, so as to be stanchen with true observation of them, we have fewer good sacred poems than of any other kind."

Thus Dr. Jackson, book i. on the Creed, ch. 14. David Chytreaus hath also an excellent discourse on this subject, to show that the ancient poetry among the heathen contained the doctrine of God, and of celestial things; all the offices and rewards of virtue, with the punishment of vice; the history of their kings, and the noble acts of famous men, tom. i. of his works, p. 154, &c., where he confirms this out of the verses of Orpheus, who lived (as he computes) about a hundred and fifty years before David; and those of Pindar, Simonides, and the rest, who lived in the time of the war with Xerxes. But Moses led the way to this; whose mind was raised to the immensity of thoughts and speech which we find in his songs, by admiration of those strange events which he saw, Exod. xv., Numb. xxii., and here in the next chapter, wherein he was followed by Deborah, Barak, and Hannah, &c., in aftertimes, Judg. v., v Sam. ii.

CHAPTER XXXII.

1 Moses' song, which setteth forth God's mercy and vengeance. 46 He exhorteth them to set their hearts upon it. 48 God sendeth him up to mount Nebo, to see the land, and die.

1 Gave ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth.

CHAP. XXXII.

Ver. 1.] He calls angels and men to bear witness (xxx. 18) that the Israelites had been admonished of their duty, and warned of their danger; and this, not by words of his own invention, but which were evil will befall you in the latter days; because ye will do evil in the sight of the Lord, to provoke him to anger through the work of your hands.

30 And Moses spake in the ears of all the congregation of Israel the words of this song, until they were ended.
CHAPTER XXXII.

upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass.

3 Because I will publish the name of the Lord: ascribe ye greatness unto our God.

4 He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all have observed, he may be thought to intimate thereby, that if they would not hearken and keep his precepts, the heavens were forbidden to give them rain, and the earth to bring forth fruit. The gloss also of the Jerusalem Targum is not amiss, that Moses, being so very good (see cap. xi., v. 30, and cap. xxv., v. 9), endured through all ages, to be witnesses against them when he was gone. But the following observation is too curious: That Isaiah, when he prophesied, i.e. being far remote from the heavens, and near to the earth, calls upon the heavens to hear, and the earth to give ear, or attend: whereas Moses, quite contrary, approaching now very near to the heavens, calls upon them to attend or give ear, and, being in spirit remote from the earth, bids it hear.

Ver. 2. My doctrine shall drop as the rain. Or, "Let my doctrine drop," &c. For this seems to be a prayer, that his words, which were sent from heaven to them, might sink into their hearts, and sooth them, as the drops of rain and the dew do the earth, and produce such fruits of obedience as might make them happy.

As the small rain upon the tender herb. The aforesaid Targum thus paraphrases this whole verse: "Let the doctrine of my law be as sweet upon the children of Israel as the rain; and the word of my mouth be received by them as the delicate dew: let it be as gentle showers refreshing the grass, and as the drops of the latter rain, descending and watering the blades of corn in the month of March."

Ver. 3. Because I will publish the name of the Lord. For my song shall be concerning the Lord of heaven and earth, whose glorious perfections I will proclaim; which make him the sole object of your worship.

And thou shalt know therefore the infinite power of our God; and his sovereign dominion over all; and give honour and service to none besides him. These three verses seem to be the preface to the song; and now follows the song itself; which Josephus calls σωφία τινῶν εὐφρόσυναν, "a poem in hexameters, which some have imitated." And Moses adorns upon them to attend or give ear, and, being in spirit remote from the earth, bids it hear.

Ver. 4. He is the Rock. Always endures, and never changes; so that in him we may find at all times a sure refuge.

His work is perfect. Whateover he undertakes, he perfects and completes it.

For all his ways are judgment. He doth nothing without the greatest reason, and according to the rules of the greatest justice.

A God of truth. Who is faithful to his promises.

Without iniquity. And never deceives or wrongs any man.

Just and right is he. Nor will he punish any man without a cause, or more than he deserves.

Maimonides takes the first words of this verse, "He is the Rock," to signify the first principle, and the efficient cause of all things without himself. For so the word Rock is used, when God bids the children of Israel "look to the rock out of which they were hewn" (Isa. li. 1), that is, to Abraham their father, from whom they were descended. And so he thinks it signifies, ver. 18, of this chapter, "Of the Rock the children of Israel were hewn." (See Jer. xxiv. 7.) He also takes it as the author of their being. And again, ver. 30, "their Rock (i.e. the Lord) sold them" (see More Nevoochin, cap. i. cap. 16). And then by the next words, "his way is perfect," he thinks is meant, that as he is the creator of all things, so there is no defect or superfluity in his works. For he takes these words to be the same with those, Gen. i. 31, "God saw everything that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (see cap. xxv., and par. iii., cap. 25). And as his works of creation are most perfect, so are his works of providence; for he governs the world with the greatest judgment and justice. So he seems to understand the next words (par. iii., cap. 17), "all his ways are judgment." We are ignorant of the methods and reasons of his judgments, yet no injustice or iniquity is ascribed to him. But all the evil and all the good that befalls any man, or the whole church, proceeds from the just and equal judgment of God. And more largely, cap. 49, "Our narrow minds cannot apprehend either the perfection of his works, or the equity of his judgments; for we apprehend his admirable works only by parts, as if neither we had the bodies of immortal beings in a celestial sphere: and in like manner we apprehend but a little of his judgments; for that of which we are ignorant in both, is far more than that which we know of either." I conclude this with the words of the author of Sepher Cosri (par. iii. sect. 11), "He that believes this, that all God's works are perfect, and his ways are blameless, will always live in a happy and pleasant life: all afflictions will be made light to him, nay, he will rejoice that his iniquities are hereby alleviated, and that he shall one day be rewarded for his patience; which he teaches men by his example, and thereby justifies the judgments of God." With respect to which, I suppose, the Jews now begin the prayer which they make at the burial of their dead, and thereby justify the judgments of God.

Ver. 5. They have corrupted themselves, &c. I know not how to justify this translation, nor that in the margin, "He hath corrupted himself." Maimonides translates them the words, "he is corrupted," and the next words an answer to them, in this manner; "Did he (i.e. God, the Rock before spoken of) do him any hurt?" For the Hebrew word seethelk, with lamed after it, signifies to hurt, or destroy, Numb. xxvii. 15; 1 Sam. xxvii. 10 (as Joh. Cocceius observes, in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 704). And so the meaning is, "Is God to blame for the evils that befal him, i.e. Israel." Unto which the answer follows in the next words, which we thus translate—Their spot is not the spot of his children. In the Hebrew the first word of this sentence is let, i.e. not, or no. Which the accent tiphah (as they call it) under it, shows is not to be joined with the words that follow (bananam moseon), but taken by itself, being a denial of the foregoing question. And these words are thus to be translated, "No, his children are their blot;" i.e. all the evil that befalls them is the fruit of their children's wickedness. And so these words are in effect the same with those of Solomon, Prov. xix., "The foolishness of man perverteth his way, and his heart fretteth against the Lord." We cannot comprehend the meaning of the words at present, because the fault is in himself (see More Nevoochin, par. iii., cap. 15).

Onkelos translates it thus: "They corrupted to themselves, not to him, children that served idols;"
6 Do ye thus require the Lord, O foolish people and unwise? is not he thy father that hath bought thee? hath he not made thee, and established thee?

7 ¶ Remember the days of old, consider the years of many generations: ask thy father, and he will shew thee; thy elders, and they will tell thee.

8 When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel.

9 For the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance.

10 He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness; he led him about, he instructed him, he kept him as the apple of his eye.
11 As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them on her wings:

12 So the Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him.

13 He made him ride on the high places of the earth, that he might eat the increase of the fields; and he made him to suck honey out of the rock, and oil out of the flinty rock;

14 Butter of kine, and milk of sheep, with fat of lambs, and rams of the breed of Bashan, and goats, with the fat of kidneys of wheat; and thou didst drink the pure blood of the grape.
Drink the pure blood of the grape.] Most generous red wine; very clear and bright. So Achill, Tattius, lib. ii. calls wine αἷμα Βορρώων.

Maimonides, in his More Neochoim, par. ii. cap. 47, takes all the expressions in this verse to be metaphorical, signifying (as Onkelos allegorizes them) the priests and Levites, in the future tense, and when they had poured out their blood like water on the ground.

Ver. 15. Jeshurun waxed fat.] Grew rich, saith Onkelos and the Jerusalem Targum.

And kicked. Against him who fed him so plentifully and deliciously. It seems to be a metaphor taken from oxen, who, being stirred up with a goad to labour, lift up their heels and kick against him who pricks them forward. So did the Israelites when they were urged and pressed to their duty by the prophets; not only despised, but evil-entreated them.

Why Israel is called Jeshurun is not easy to resolve. Jo. Cocceius (in his Ultima Mosis, sect. 973) derives it from Šur, which signifies to see, behold, or dream out from whence, in the future tense and the plural number comes Jeshurua, which, by the addition of nun paragregium, as they speak, makes Jeshurun, that is "The people who had the vision of God." I know nothing more simple, nor more probable than this; which highly aggravated their sin, who, having God so nigh unto them (iv. 7), and their elders having heard the voice of God, and having been ungrateful (as to rebel against him, and worship other gods. Some refer this kicking to their revolt from the house of David; when Jeroboam, to preserve his new kingdom, set up the golden calves, to prevent the return of the people to their old master, by going up to Jerusalem to worship.

They art waxen fat, thou art grown thick, thou art covered with fatness. This variety of expressions is used to signify how exceeding bountifully God had provided for them; and withal, how very wanton and insolent they were grown, as cattle fed in a fat posture are wont to be. The words with fatness (after covered) are not in the Hebrew, but are well supplied out of other places, particularly Ps. xvii. 10.

The Targum here hath it, "They forsook the Word of God." Which made him.] Advanced them from a desert where they found them (ver. 6, 10), into a very rich and plentiful country. This was the lamentable effect of their plethoras, or fulness; unto which we are all too prone, as an excellent person of our own hath long ago observed. Even such as were most upright (saith he) when they wax fat, spurn with the heel, and cast away the memory of their misery, and of God's former mercy, behind their backs. And what was the reason that the Israelites waxed thus full and fat? Only because they did not use that exercise which God had appointed to keep them under, and preserve the hearts from being lifted up (Deut. viii. 11, &c.): "Take heed to thyself, lest when thou hast eaten, and filled thyself, &c., then thy heart be lifted up, and thou forget the Lord thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt, &c. The daily and lively representation, or recognition of their condition there, should have been as usual to them as their meat and drink, yea, as it were, their thanksgivings before and after meats," as our Dr. Jackson speaks, book xi. on the Creed, ch. 34. And Maimonides himself, mentioning those very words, "Lest when thou hast eaten, and filled thyself," &c., very well observes, that to prevent pride and apostacy, which grow out of great plenty, God commanded them to offer their first-fruits before him every year, with a solemn confession, how poor they were in the beginning, and then raised by God to be a mighty people (Deut. xxvi. 5, 6, &c.). For which end the passover institution was made, and the annual sacrifice of the firstlings when they came forth out of Egypt all the days of their life" (Deut. xvi. 3). See More Neochov. par. ii. cap. 39.

And lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation. As there was a progress in their insolent forgetfulness of God, expressed in three phrases, which may signify three degrees of their stupidity ("waxed fat, grown thick, and covered with fatness"); some observe as many degrees of their rebellion: first, they kicked against God, i.e. threw off the yoke of his laws, and refused to observe them; secondly, they "forsook God," and fell into idolatry; and, lastly, they "lightly esteemed the Rock of their salvation." Where the Hebrew word nībel signifies more than a light moment; if we compare the clause with nībelah, a dead carcass (as some think it doth), it denotes the greatest abhorrence, nothing being so much abominable among the Jews as a dead carcass, the touching of which was the highest pollution. And thus J. Cocceius and Campeg. Vitringa understand it; who observe that this was never so fulfilled as in their behaviour towards our Lord Jesus; he was indeed the Rock of their salvation, and so vilely used by them, as if he had been the most loathsome man upon earth. So Vitringa expounds these words (in his Observ. Sacr. lib. ii. cap. 9, p. 173), "instant flagitii tractavit ruemum salutis." For this is a word used by God himself, when he would cause his utter detestation of Nineveh, and his dealing with her according to her wickedness, Nahum i. 6: "I will cast abominable filth upon thee, and make thee vile," &c., and when he speaks of the disgrace he would put upon his own temple, Jer. xiv. 21. The LXX. indeed simply expound the word ἀδριν, "he departed;" but the last words they expound ἀκοῦσαι τῶν ἑτοιμών σωτήρων "from God his Saviour," as Onkelos also, "his most exalted name," his most perfect Saviour. Cocceius and Maimonides, in greatest sense, is the Lord Jesus; for none brought such salvation to them, and wroth such a redemption for them, as he did, who is "the stone which God laid in Sion," &c. (Isa. xxxviii. 16). But instead of flying to him, as men in danger do to a rock, or strong fortress, they not only rejected him, but abused and put the highest indignities upon him.

Ver. 16. They provoked him to jealousy with strange gods.] Whom they fell in love withal, and worshipped. This was the ground of his jealousy, their falseness to God, who had espoused them to himself. And the Hebrew word zār (strange) we must sometimes take in the same sense, to make a strange god and another god are the same (Ps. lxxxi. 9; Exod. xx. 3). Therefore God saith, he will not give his glory to another (Isa. xlii. 8), and that their sorrows shall be multiplied that "hasten after another god" (Ps. xvi. 4).

With abominations provoked them to anger.] I take this in the most proper sense of the word, as if their idols were being called abominations, because God exceedingly hates them (vii. 25; 1 Kings xi. 5). Though R. Solomon and Abarinbel, by abominations, here understand those filthy mixtures forbidden in Lev. xviii. with witchcrafts, and suchlike wickedness. And Abarbinel refers the first part of this verse to the times under the second temple, when they were free from idolatry, they were corrupted with other abominable filthiness.

Ver. 17. They sacrificed unto devils, not to God.] The Hebrew word shedim, which we translate devils, imports as much as destroyers (as the devil is called in the end of Revelation, x. 11.); evil spirits delighting in mischief, and leading those that worship them into perdition. Though some think they are called shedim ironically, by way of scorn, the true God being Shaddai, the Omnipotent, and All-sufficient; and these called, by way of mockery, counterfeit gods, who had no power to help their worshippers, nor were sufficient to preserve themselves. Either of these accounts of the word is better than that of Manasseh ben Israel, who derives it from נזף a field, because they frequent desert places. But then they should have been called sedim, not shedim, as he must needs know, who was a great master in the Hebrew learning. The LXX. call them here δασάρεις, and so do the other godfathers. (Who were they who worshipped led men into the impiety of worshipping other gods, either themselves or other beings, which they persuaded simple people had some divinity in them; and that not only the stars, but even beasts here upon the earth, nay, onions and garlic, which they did not take to be gods, but things by which, as intermediate causes, their gods were pleased, or offended with them, and therefore worshipped them.

To gods whom they knew not.] Or, as the words may be translated, "gods that knew not them," that is, had never bestowed any benefits upon them: for, as it follows, they were new gods, never before heard of by their ancestors.

New gods that came newly up.] Such as Jeroboam's calves, invented out of his own brain; and the gods of other nations, Moloch and Baal, which were new to the Israelites, and had not been known among them; for the demon gods were of no great antiquity: Bel, or Baal (as he is called in the Chaldee dialect), the first king of Babel after Nimrod, being the first that ever was deified (as Mr. Mede observes), or ῦἄρης, as the gods of other nations were called Baalim, as all the Roman emperors were called Caesars, from the first emperor of that name (see p. 776). Besides which, the heathens had another higher sort of demons, which had never been linked to a mortal body, viz., those we call angels, whom the Israelites were taught to believe to be but ministers unto their God, and therefore not to be worshipped.

Whom your fathers feared not.] That is, did not worship. This was a great aggravation of their guilt, that when they would have other objects of worship, they did not return unto those whom their ancestors had reverenced (the Teraphim, for instance, which were the gods of Laban and Rachel), for whose worship they might have pretended tradition; but chose gods whom their forefathers were not acquainted withal; which was a token of a strange proneness to idolatry. And Maimonides, mentioning this verse, observes, that they worshipped not only things that had a being, but mere imaginations; for which he quotes these words of the book Siphri: "It was not enough that they worshipped the sun, moon, and stars, and celestial signs, but they worshipped their shadow" (More Neveochim, par. iii. cap. 16).

Ver. 18. Of the Rock that begat thee] God, the author of thy being. See ver. 4. Thou art unmindful!] Being wholly intent on idols which they themselves have made.

Hast forgotten God that formed thee.] Into a kingdom of priests, making them his peculiar people (Exod. xix. 5, 6).

Ver. 19. He abhorred them.] Cast them off, as they had done him. Because of the provoking of his sons, and of his daughters.] For so they were till they corrupted themselves, and thereby highly incensed him against them: for nothing can be so provoking as the rebellion of children against a most indulgent parent. Maimonides translates it, "By provocations which they made prostrate their government." More Neveochim, par. i. cap. 36. where he observes, we never find the word causa (which is here used, signifying indignation) in Scripture applied to God, but only when it speaks of idolatry.

Ver. 20. He said.] Resolved. I will hide my face from them.] See xxxi. 17, 18. I will see what their end shall be.] Not cease my judgments till I have brought the sorest calamities upon them, and made an end of them, that is, of their polity and government.

A very froward generation.] Incorrigibly wicked. Children in whom is no faith.] Who had broken their covenant with him (xxxi. 16) so often, that they were not to be trusted when they made promise of repentance. The book of Judges, and indeed their whole history, testifies to the truth of this.

Ver. 21. Moved me to jealousy] See ver. 16. With that which is not God.] By worshipping God's creatures, or the work of their own hands.

Provoked me to anger with their vanities. The same thing, in other words; all the gods of the nations whom they worshipped, being mere vanities (or things of nought, as the Jerusalem Targum hath it), as hath been often observed. I will move them to jealousy.] He threatens to be even with them, and serve them in their kind.

With those which are not a people.] Who either were not a nation in being at this time, or so obscure, base, and ignoble, that they were not worthy the name of a nation. The Jews interpret it of the Chaldeans, whom God raised up on a sudden, when nobody would believe it (Hab. i. 5, 6, &c.), to be a terrible scourge to them (see Isa. xxiii. 13).

I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation.] The Jews thought all nations so except themselves. And, in one sense, all the gentiles were really so: for move them to jealousy with those which are not a people; I will provoke them to anger with a foolish nation.

22 For a fire is kindled in mine anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with her increase, and set on fire the foundations of the mountains.

23 I will heap mischiefs upon them; I will spend mine arrows upon them.

24 They shall be burnt with hunger, and devoured with burning heat, and with bitter destruction: I will also send the teeth of beasts upon them, with the poison of serpents of the dust.

25 The sword without, and terror within, shall destroy both the young man and the virgin, the suckling also with the man of gray hairs.

26 I said, I would scatter them into corners, I would make the remembrance of them to cease from among men:

27 Were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy, lest their adversaries should behave themselves strangely, and lest they should say, Ver. 24. They shall be burnt with hunger.] This verse and the next explain what he means by arrows, which are here enumerated. And, first, he threatens a famine, with which he saith they should be burnt; either because these judgments are compared to fire, ver. 22, or because extreme hunger parches the inward parts, and makes the visage "as black as a coal," as Jeremiah speaks, Lam. iv. 8.

Devoured with burning heat,] With fevers and calentures, as they are called in hot countries.

With the poison of serpents of the dust.] Whose bites were deadly. And they were exposed to them, as well as to wild beasts. And, first, they threatened to fly into wildernesses, and hide themselves in dens and caves; where some of them could not avoid being devoured by wild beasts and bitten by serpents, which lay lurking in those holes. So Cocceius, in his Ultima Mosia, sect. 1271, where he notes also that this was fulfilled in part when they were thrown by the Romans to wild beasts in the theatre, and Josephus relates, Euseb. cap. 16. They were devoured with biting serpents; which he calls bitter, because it was incurable.

I will send the teeth of wild beasts upon them.] This was another of the sore judgments which God threatened to their disobedience (see Lev. xxvi. 29). Upon which Maimonides observed, that magicians were wont to promise them, by their arts, to free their cities, and plantations from lions and serpents, and such like hurtful creatures; unto whose power God delivered them, because they forsook him, and followed idolaters and magicians (More Nevouk. par.iii. cap. 37).

Both the young man and the virgin, &c.] He threatens to deliver them into such merciless hands as would spare none, nor make any difference of sex or of age. This Hueterus refers to the last destruction of Jerusalem, in his Demonstrum Evang. prop. ix. cap. 173, and Abarbenel also confesses it was then fulfilled.

Ver. 26. I said.] i.e. Resolved.

Make the remembrance of them to cease] Utterly destroy them, so that not one of them should be found; and if any remained they should skulk, and not dare to appear among men.

Ver. 27. Were it not that I feared the wrath of the enemy.] He that is omnipotent is not capable of bearing anything; but he speaks in our language, and gives this reason why he did not make them cease to be a nation, because he would not have their enemies insult and grow outrageous in their insolent lan-two put ten thousand to flight, except their Rock had sold them, and the Lord had shut them up?
31 For their rock is not as our Rock, even our enemies themselves being judges.
32 For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah: their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter:

That they understood this, &c.] Or, as it may be translated, "Then would they understand this, they would consider their latter end." They would soon perceive the hand of God in all that is befallen them; and that if they do not change their course, they will, in the conclusion, be utterly undone.

Ver. 30. How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight? Whence should such an amazing change proceed? that the Israelites, who formerly with a handful of men put vast armies to flight (Lev. xxvi. 8) should now, though never so numerous, be beaten by one or two of their enemies, fleeing when none pursues them? (Lev. xxvi. 17, 36; Deut. xxviii. 29.)

Except their Rock is sold them. A little consideration was sufficient to make them understand, that this had been impossible, if they had not forsaken their God; who therupon delivered them up to the will of their enemies. For by their Rock is meant God; and his selling them is his quitting his interest in them, and giving them up to be slaves to those that hated them.

The Lord had shut them up? So that they could not escape the hands of their enemies.

Ver. 31. For their rock is not as our Rock. None of the gods of the heathen (whom he calls their rock, because they relied on them for safety) have such power as he that gave us our being. So Maimonides interprets the word צור, "the spring and fountain of all things."

Our enemies—being judges. Who were often forced to acknowledge his overruling power and providence, controlling all their designs. As the Egyptians confessed, Exod. xiv. 2, 5, and Balaam, Num. xxiii. 19, 22, and the Philistines, 1 Sam. iv. 7, 8, and the king of Babylon, Dan. iii. 29.

Ver. 32. For their vine is of the vine of Sodom, and of the fields of Gomorrah. I suppose he speaks here of the Israelites (giving an account why their enemies so shamefully chased them, ver. 30) who are compared to a vine, which God brought out of Egypt, and planted in Canaan (Psa. lxxx. 8). And the prophet afterward calls them "the plant of his pleasure" (Isa. v. 7). Which was an ancient resemblance, as appears by this place; where he represents them as such a degenerate people, that they were as bad (nay, worse, as the marginal translation is) as the Sodomites, or the people of Gomorrah: and therefore deserved (ver. 26) to be utterly destroyed, as they were (see Isa. l. 10; Jer. ii. 21).

Their grapes are grapes of gall, their clusters are bitter.] These words represent their actions (called fruit in Scripture) to be so wicked that they were not to be endured. And so Josephus describes them before their last destruction, lib. vi. De Bello Judeico, cap. ult. where he saith, if the Romans had delayed to fall upon such a wicked people, he thinks either the earth would have opened its mouth and swallowed them up, or a flood drowned their city, or thunder and lightning from heaven destroyed it, as it did Sodom, For γάρ τῶν ταύτα παραπόνα γεγένη γεγένη δεισίδ], "for they were a more atheistical generation than they who suffered such things." And again (lib. vii. cap. 30), he saith, that the time when they were de-33 Their wine is the poison of dragons, and the cruel venom of asps.
34 Is not this laid up in store with me, and sealed up among my treasures?
35 To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence; their foot shall slide in due time: for the day of their calamity is at hand, and the things that shall come upon them make haste.
36 For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants, when he seeth stroyed was so fruitful in all manner of wickedness among the Jews, as μηδεις καιαως θυρων ἀρακτων καταπεταση, "that there was no one work of wickedness that was not committed; nor can one imagine any thing so bad that they did not do; endeavouring publicly, as well as privately, to excel one another both in impunity towards God and injustice to their neighbours."

Ver. 36. Their wine is the poison of dragons.] This still represents their fruit, that is, their works, to be most pernicious, being compared to the poison of dragons. Many authors, indeed, say that dragons have no poison in them (as B. Chytraeus and others observe); but as the Hebrew word thanaaim signifies any kind of serpent, so it is certain that the dragons of Africa and Arabia had a deadly poison in them, though those of Greece and Egypt, which have the most venomous fangs, were large, in his Hierozoic, par. ii. lib. iii. cap. 14. Who also observes, in another place, that the Hebrew word rosh signifying both the head and also poison; the poison of serpents lies partly in their gall, partly in their teeth, and partly in a little bladder under their tongue (par. i. lib. i. cap. 4).

The cruel venom of asps.] The poison of asps is called cruel, because it is accounted the acutest of all others, instantly penetrating into the vital parts. Whence the proverb διόγμα σπίδων, "the biting of asps," for an incurable wound. For they who are bitten by an asp seldom escape with their life; as Aristotle, Pliny, and a great many other authors observe, in Bothart, par. iii. lib. iii. cap. 34.

Is not this?] That is, the vengeance he is going to speak of in the following verses. For this particle he of ten refers to what comes after, not to what goes before, as Cocceius observes.

Laid up in store.] To be produced in due time. Sealed up among my treasures?] He speaks of it as a matter determined or decreed, as deeds are which are signed and sealed, though not presently executed, but kept safely in a cabinet. And the meaning of this verse is, that though he do not speedily punish evildoers, it is not because he doth not observe them, or forgets what they do; for he hath prefixed a time to reckon with them, as will appear in the issue.

Ver. 35. To me belongeth vengeance, and recompence.] As the supreme Lord, Governor, and Judge of the world, it is to punish offenders. It is evident the apostle, alleging these words (Rom. xii. 19), εἰς ἱδανη, "vengeance is mine" (or to me belongeth vengeance), exactly follows the Hebrew text, and not the present LXX., which render these words εἰς ἱδας ἱδανη καταπετασμα, "in the day of vengeance I will recompense." Their foot shall slide] Though they think themselves unmovably fixed in their dominion, they shall certainly fall. In due time.] Not so soon, perhaps, as men may expect; but when the great Judge of the world sees it most seasonable.

For the day of their calamity is at hand.] When they little thought of it, and prized themselves in their prosperity, God suddenly brought down the Chaldeans, who had been the great instruments of plaguesing the Jews (Isa. xxvii. 7—10, &c. Jer. i. 15, 27, 31, ii. 6, 8). And so shall the plagues of Babylon the great "come in one day. In one hour her great riches shall come to nought!" (Rev. xviii. 8, 10, 17)

Ver. 36. The Lord shall judge his people.] Plead their cause, as the Scripture elsewhere speaks (Jer. i. 24), and deliver them from the oppression of their enemies; as this phrase is often used in the book of Psalms (viii. 8, x. 18).

Repet himself for his servants.] Have mercy upon them (as the Vulgar truly expresses the sense), and turn his hand, which punishes them, upon their enemies (see Jer. i. 23, ii. 24).

When the justice of their power is gone.] That they are not able to help themselves. That it is the due time or season, before mentioned, for God to interpose, when the enemies of his people think themselves irresistible, there being none able to oppose them.

There is none shut up, or left.] Some refer this to persons, and others to things; and either way it signifies their condition to be so far from what they could do nothing, either by money, for their deliverance. J. Forster translates these words, custodium aut neglectum, i.e. "precious or vile." By which wonderful deliverance and restoration, when they were so totally destitute of all help, all the world was given to understand that there is no God like unto the Lord.

Ver. 37. He shall say.] Or, "It shall be said." Where are their gods, their rock in whom they trusted?] It is dubious whether these words be directed to the Jews or to the gentiles who had oppressed them. It seems most agreeable to take them as a reproach to the enemies of the Jews, who had long bragged of the power of their gods, and ascribed all their success to them (ver. 27), who now could not deliver them in their distress, &c.

Ver. 38. Which did eat the fat of their sacrifices, &c.] For the same rites were used among the gentiles as among the Jews; who offered all the fat upon the altar, and there poured out the wine which accompanied the meat-offering, &c. (see Num. xv.). The LXX. refer this to the worshippers themselves, and translate it thus (agreeably enough to the Hebrew). The fat of whose sacrifices ye ate, and drank the wine of their drink-offerings," And Onkelos to the same purpose.

Let them rise up and help you, and be your protection.] From the calamity which was unavoidably coming upon them (Isa. xlvii. 1, 2, 7; Jer. li. 17, 18).

Ver. 39. See now!] Open your eyes now at last, and be convinced, by your sad experience, of your error.

That I, even I, am he.] That it is I, and none but I, who have made these changes in the world: first making you instruments in punishing my people; and now inflicting the like punishments upon you (Jer. li. 24, 25, 49).

The words in the Hebrew being, I, I am he, the author of the old Nitzzeon was sensible that we 42 I will make mine arrows drunk with blood, and my sword shall devour flesh: and that with the blood of the slain and of the captives, from the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.

43 Rejoice, O ye nations, with his people: for he will avenge the blood of his servants, and will render vengeance to his adversaries, and will be merciful unto his land, and to his people.

Will reward them that hate me.] For, as Jeremiah speaks, li. 56, "The Lord God of recompenses will surely requite." For it is the vengeance of the Lord" (as he speaks in the foregoing chapter concerning Babylon, i. 15). "Take vengeance upon her; as she hath done, do unto her." Ver. 12. I will make mine arrows drunk with blood.] Make an exceeding great slaughter (Isa. xxxiv. 3, 6). Of the blood of the slain] This signifies none should be spared: for they should be killed who were taken captive, as well as those who fell in the battle.

From the beginning of revenges upon the enemy.] How the Hebrew word para comes to signify revenge, I am not able to give an account; but my sense we take it both here and in Judges v. 2. The word para, from whence it seems to be derived, signifies to make bare, or naked. And so the Vulgar Latin here understands it; and thence J oh. Forsterus hath given a probable sense of these words (taking resad, which we translate beginning, for the head, as it properly signifies, or the king, in its metaphorical signification, the head by the enemy): that is, the taking away of the kingdom and priesthood from Israel. The LXX. translate it ἀπὸ κεφαλῆς ἀδελφῶν ἰδιῶν. "from the head of the princes of the enemies." Which is a sense very agreeable, if we could find any word in the Hebrew like to para, which signifies princes or rulers. But I think there is a more simple sense may be given of these words than any of the forementioned, only by supposing the particle lamed to be omitted (as in many other places) before paraith, which is this, "From the king to the slave of the enemies." For they were wont to save their captives, as every one knows, by way of contempt and scorn. Which is the reason that in the Vulgate also the term is translated by the prophets, when he was so angry with them, that he gave them up to be slaves. Next to this is the translation of Onkelos, "I will take away (these words he adds) the crowns from the head of the enemy." Which was making the king's head bare. This universal slaughter is most notably expressed by Jeremiah, i. 35—37, 45. And some think this prophecy will be bare most amply fulfilled, when the Jews shall be called, and made members of the church of Christ (see Dr. Jackson, book. xi. on the Creed, ch. 19).

Ver. 43. Rejoice. O ye nations, with his people.] Here the particle ech is omitted before auma, as I supposed, in the foregoing words, lamed to be before paraith. What is to be supposed in the Vulgate, the interpreter of words, "O ye nations, praise his people." But the LXX. discerned the true sense, and translate it as we do: the apostle having justified their translation in Rom. xv. 10, where he expresses this, word for word, as they do, εὐφανείτε ἔτην μετὰ τοῦ λαοῦ αὐτοῦ. "rejoice ye gentiles with his people." But it must here be noted, that the LXX. without the Vulgate, introduces other, which are very remarkable, εὐφανείτε σποράι ἐν αὐτῷ, καὶ προσκυνήσαντοι αὐτόν πᾶσις ἐνθολοῦσιν εὐδοκεῖν, "rejoice ye heavens together with him, and Christians might hence observe, that there are two who are here called God, the Father and the Son. And therefore takes care to inform his reader, that there are not two first principles of things. Which, as no Christian is so foolish as to affirm, so their own authors have acknowledged more persons than one, here called God. Thus Jonathan, in his paraphrase, plainly supposes another person in the Divinity, whom he calls the Word, when he thus explains this verse: "When the Word of the Lord shall reveal himself to redeem his people, he shall say to all people, I am he that have been, and am, and shall be (see Rev. i. 8), and by my word kill and make alive. I smite the people of Israel, and I will heal them in the end of the days." Which makes these words a plain prophecy of the Messiah, and him to be God. And so, as the Chaldee "See, that I now am he in my Word, and there is no god besides me: I am he who live the living in this world, and raise the dead in the world to come," &c.

There is no god with me.] As I have no superior, so neither have I any equal.

I kill, and I make alive.] If I please to destroy any people for their sins none can hinder me; and if any resist me, because of their feet safety. R. Isaac, in his Chissuk Emuna (par. i. cap. 6, sect. 20), alleges these words as a prophecy of the resurrection of the dead in the days of the Messiah. And in another place (cap. 10), he alleges them as an effectual confutation of those ancient heretics who imagined two supreme powers; one of them, the other of all gods; and that he revell'd himself to all evil (which I observed upon Lev. xxvi. to have been a very ancient opinion): for there could not be, they fancied, the same care which had an influence upon both. To remove which false conceit, God declares, I will, as well as make alive, &c. And for the same reason he saith, in Isa. xlv. 7, "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil; I the Lord am all these things.

Neither is there any that can deliver.] Nor can any reverse the judgment that I pass upon men.

Ver. 40. For I lift up my hand to heaven.] Swear solemnly to do what follows; viz. be revenged on his enemies, as well as deliver his people. Thus Abra- ham anciently swore, Gen. ix. 22. And when God promised to bring the Israelites into Canaan, he is said "to lift up his hand" (Exod. vi. 8; Neh. ix. 15). From whence some think the word promittere is derived, signifying to engage by stretching out the hand; and that from thence sprang the custom of stretching out, and lifting up their hand, when they swear. Which the gentiles practised, as those known words of Virgin informs us, Exeud. xii.

"Suspiciens cedum tenditque ad libera dextream." When God therefore is said to lift up his hand to heaven, the meaning is, he swears by himself; as it here follows.

"I live for ever.] As sure as I live.

Ver. 41. If I let my glittering sword.] Make all things ready for the execution of my judgments.

Mijn hand take hold on judgment.] I begin to punish. I will render vengeance to mine enemies.] None wound, and I heal: neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand.

10 For I lift up my hand to heaven, and say, I live for ever.

41 If I let my glittering sword, and mine hand take hold on judgment; I will render vengeance to mine enemies, and will reward them that hate me.
44 ¶ And Moses came and spake all the words of this song in the ears of the people, he, and Hoshea the son of Nun.

45 And Moses made an end of speaking these words to all Israel:

46 And he said unto them, Set your hearts unto all the words which I testify among you this day, which ye shall command your children to observe to do, all the words of this law.

47 For it is not a vain thing for you; because

Will render vengeance to his adversaries.] To all such as oppose this blessed union; and first to the Jews, who set themselves against it more than any others (being mad at the apocryph for preaching to the gentiles), and then to the Romans, who persecuted all those who embraced Christianity.

Be merciful unto his land.] This cannot be meant of the land of Israel, which was no longer God's land than any other, but of the whole earth (as Codd. and some of versions of LXX. well explain it); in which that one people of God dwells, reduced (as he speaks) in the whole multitude of the faithful into one catholic church. For they all acknowledge, from the greatest to the least, that one only Omnipotent God, with no less devotion and affection, than Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Moses did.

To his people.] The whole world that believe in Christ, and are his faithful servants; whose blood he will avenge (Rev. xix. 2), and then set up his tabernacle with men, and dwell with them, and shall be his people, and he will be their God (Rev. xx. 3); which I mention, because this part of the prophecy reaches unto the last times, and is not yet all fulfilled.

Thus this famous song concludes, which, as the Jews reekon, consists of seventy verses, each of which contains two distinct and entire sentences, and, as they fancy, is a compendium of the whole law of Moses. Nay, some of them (such are the idle conceits of this nation) think this hymn is so perfect a prophecy, that it contains in it the names of all the men in the world; which they undertake to find, and by that versicle where it is, to tell what fortune he, whose name they seek, shall have in the world. Thus, instead of observing seriously what Moses foretold would certainly befall themselves, their superstition and hardness of heart have led them to vain conjectures concerning other men. See J. Wagensen upon this song. But I shall not undertake to show him his name in this song, which fell out in a verse that signified prosperity to him. And since him Martinus Mauriutis, in his book De Sortitione Hebraeorum, cap. 16, sect. 3—5.

Ver. 44. Moses—spake all the words of this song] The very same that is said before he spake this song (xxt. 30), and is now repeated at the conclusion of it, to express his fidelity in his office to the very last.

He, and Hoshea] Who was now his assistant in this work, as he was designed to be his successor after his death. He is commonly called Joshua, but Oshea was his name at the first (Num. xiii. 8).

Ver. 45.] When he had made an end of speaking them, then he added what follows.

Ver. 46. He will avenge the blood of his servants.] These words seem to express some of the motives that should persuade the gentiles to become one body with the Jews, for such the apostles and all the first converts were, God's punishing all those who shed the blood of his servants; as the Christian martyrs are called in the book of the Revelation. In which confidence the LXX. add another sentence before these words, and express them thus: "And let all the sons of God be strong in him."
CHAPTER XXXII.

it is your life: and through this thing ye shall prolong your days in the land, whither ye go over Jordan to possess it.

48 And the Lord spake unto Moses that selfsame day, saying,

49 Get thee up into this mountain Abarim, unto mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, that is over against Jericho; and behold the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel for a possession:

50 And die in the mount whither thou goest many witnesses of God's presence with him, as there were men in their nation. But he had seen so many instances of their unbelief, that he uses all the ways, manners, and forms (as Pellicanus observes), that he could think of, to urge them to obedience: by delivering them tables of their laws written by God himself, by books, by pillars, by blessings, cursings, obser-

51 Because ye trespassed against me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-Kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin; because ye sanctified not in the midst of the children of Israel.

52 Yet thou shalt see the land before thee: but thou shalt not go thither unto the land which I give the children of Israel. Immediately after he had ended the foregoing song, and given them this admonition at the conclusion of it.

Ver. 49. Get thee up into this mountain Abarim.] Which he had pointed him unto before, and told him what he doth now (Numb. xxvii. 12).

Unto mount Nebo.] Abarim was a ridge of hills, whereof Nebo was one (see there upon Numb. xxvii. 9).

Which is in the land of Moab.] This is a more particular description of the site of this mountain than he gave before in the book of Numbers.

The land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel.] Which he might easily do from the highest part of the mountain called Pisgah (Deut. iii. 27).

Ver. 50. Die in the mount.] After he had taken a view of the land every way.

Be gathered unto thy people.] To Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. This signifies, saith R. Isaac, that he should be associated and joined to the souls of the just, who are called his people. For the people of Moses were not buried in mount Abarim; and therefore he doth not speak of gathering his body to their bodies, but of his soul to their souls (Chissuk Emuna, par. i. cap. 11).

As Aaron] See Numb. xx. 24, 28, xxviii. 38.

Ver. 51. Because ye trespassed against me ] Rebellied against his commandments, as he speaks, Numb. xxvii. 14.

Ver. 52. Thou shalt see the land before thee.] He had earnestly begged of God that he might go over Jordan; but he denied him that favour (Deut. i. 37, iii. 25, 37), yet he was pleased to mitigate his punishment, by letting him enjoy a sight of that good country into which he might not enter.

But thou shalt not go thither.] By which the Israelites should have learnt, that as Moses left them short of the promised land, and could not bring them into the possession of it; so his law did not contain a perfect revelation of God's will, but they were to expect something beyond it.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

1 And this is the blessing, wherewith Moses the man of God blessed the children of Israel before his death.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. This is the blessing.] As Jacob blessed his children, at his departure out of the world, when God had begun to fulfill the promise to Abraham, of giving him a numerous offspring; so Moses having seen them vastly increase, and ready to enter upon the land promised to them (Gen. xv. 18, &c.), takes his farewell of them, with a blessing pronounced upon the people in general, and upon each tribe in particu-

2 And he said, The Lord came from Sinai, and rose up from Seir unto them; he shined forth from mount Paran, and he came with ten

lar. Which is in part prophetical, as the blessing of Jacob was, and delivered in the prophetic style, which hath some difficulty and obscurity in it; on purpose, perhaps, to excite their diligent study to inquire into the meaning (see Gen. xliv. 1, 3).

Wherewith Moses the man of God] Or, "the prophet of the Lord," as Onkelos translates it: for prophets are called men of God in the holy books (1 Sam. ix. 6—9, 1 Kings xii. 1, 1 Tim. vi. 11, 2 Tim. iii. 17, 4 and 5).
thousands of saints: from his right hand went a fiery law for them.

3 Yea, he loved the people; all his saints

2 Pet. i. 21), because, in the exercise of their sacred function, they did not deliver their own sense, nor the sense of other men, but the mind and will of God who spake by them.

_Blessed the children of Israel before his death._] Before he went up into Mount Abarim to die (xxiii. 49), he prayed God to bless them; and also foretold their future state and condition. Such had been the ancient custom among the holy patriarchs to leave memoirs (as we can find, for example of Jacob), to admonish their posterity upon their dying beds of such things as they thought most important: for then they could not but be thought to speak most sincerely; and their words were apt to be entertained with greater respect, and preserved in mind with greater care. Moses therefore, their deliverer, leader, and lawgiver, concludes his life in the sacred manner; and it is very likely deposited these dying words with them in writing.

_Ver. 2. The Lord came from Sinai._] And, in the first place, he endeavours to make them sensible of what God had done already for them: and the chief of all his benefits being the revelation of his mind and will to them, he commemorates that as a common blessing to all the other children of the earth (as we may see in particular to each tribe: for that is meant by "the Lord came from Sinai:" where he appeared in a most particular manner, and from thence promulgated his law with the greatest solemnity (Exod. xx.). And thus the gentiles took an unwonted brightness in any place to be a token of the ἐξοπλίσεων, "appearance," or "advent," of some of their gods in that place. As also the Jews still entertained an opinion that they took it for another token of it. See the illustrious Spanheimius, in his annotations upon Callimachus's hymn to Apollo, ver. 7, which they seem to have learnt from this appearance of God on Mount Sinai, and the quaking of that mountain, when God appeared on it.

_Rose up from Seir unto them; he silenced forth from mount Paran._] There is no difficulty in the foregoing words, it being evident that God came down on Mount Sinai, and thence delivered his commands to the Israelites, and espoused them for his people. But how he rose up from Seir unto them, the country of Edom, and shone from Paran, the country of Ishmael, is not so easy to understand. The Jews, indeed, who are wont to solve all difficulties, by inventing what they please, are not troubled to give an account of these words; which signify, they fancy, that the Divine Glory first resided upon Mount Seir, where God propounded his law to the children of Esau; but they would not have it, because they found these words in it, "Thou shalt not kill;" he went, therefore, to Paran, and offered it to the children of Ishmael, but they refused it also, because they found themselves thereby excluded from his favor; "Thou shalt not steal;" so when they came to Sinai, and gave it to the Israelites, who said, "All the words which the Lord hath said will we do," Exod. xxiv. 3. Thus the Jerusalem Targum, and Pirke Eiezer, and some other more ancient authors, with this addition, that he offered the law to all the nations of the world, but they rejected it, because it was written, "Thou shalt have none other gods but me." But this looks so like a fable, that some of themselves are ashamed of it, and have given a better sense of the words, though I cannot say the true one. For thus Abraham Peritsel expounds them, "The true law came out of Sinai to the Israelites, by which the Edomites were so enlightened, that God might be said to rise up to them also: and afterward the celestial influence shone out of this law to the Ishmaelites, who were the better for it." Thus Const. L'Empeur reports his sense in his Annotations upon Barakama, cap. 4, sect. 3, where he endeavours to make out a plainer sense of these words, in this manner: Though the mountain of Paran was higher than Sinai than Seir was, and first occurred to those that went out of Egypt; yet there was great reason to mention Seir before it, because Moses had respect to the order of his people, and was ready to go back to the people of Edom. And their journeys were so directed by Divine Providence, that, fetching a long circuit, forward and backward, they should come to Canaan. In all which turnings and windings they were marvellously preserved and provided for, by the same good Providence which conducted them. Of this Moses here makes a thankful commemoration, how he led them from Mount Sinai to the borders of the land of Canaan, towards Mount Seir, as is expressly noted by Moses (compare Deut. i. 19, with Deut. ii. 1, and Numb. xx. 14). From whence, by reason of their infidelity, they were led back again towards the Red Sea, and encamped in the extremity of the wilderness (Numb. xxxiii. 35), where Ptolemy places Paran (though there was another part of it called Paran, to the number of the Picts, Numb. xxxiii. 3, 27); and from thence they were led back again in a long circuit to the east part of the land of Canaan. This may be one reason why these two places are mentioned together with Seir, that God, who there appeared to them, was with them all the time they wandered about in the wilderness, till he brought them to the borders of Canaan. And in all this, it may be, because in Mount Seir the brazen serpent was erected by God's order, for the cure of such as were bitten by serpents, when they looked on it; which was an illustrious type of our blessed Saviour, and the salvation wrought by him (Numb. xx. 4, 9). And in the desert to which Paran gave the name (because it overlooked the whole, though very large), they received the joyful news that they should march into Canaan: or, as D. Chrysæus understands it, in the wilderness of Paran the seventy elders received the Spirit, to make them assistants unto Moses in the government (Numb. x. 12, xi. 24, &c.). And here, I may add, Moses repeated his law to them (Deut. i. 1, 5), who, seems, in this verse, to follow a metaphor borrowed from the sun, which first illuminates the air, and then rises, as he were, and abroad his beams; as God by degrees declared his presence with his people, whithersoever they went, first at Mount Sinai, then at Seir, and, last of all, here in the wilderness of Paran.

But it must be acknowledged, that these words may be interpreted in a more simple manner, they being but a further amplification of what was said in the first words, "the Lord came from Sinai." When at the same time he "rose up from Seir, and shone forth from Mount Paran." For these mountains were very near one to another; or rather parts of one and the same ridge of mountains, as Con. Pellicanus here observes; and is more clearly made out by a very learned man among ourselves (Dr. Hyde, in his most excellent notes on Abraham Peritsel's Itinerarium Mundi, p. 73), for other gods named, (which is the same with Paran, Hab. iii. 3) was near to Edom, whose chief city was Bozrah (Amos i. 12), as that was near to Sinai.

The ignorance of the Mahometans is much to be pitied, who out of this place imagine they have found as good an authority for the Acharon, as there is for the law of Moses, and for the gospel of Christ. For thus they interpret these words, "God gave the law from Sinai, and the gospel from Soir (which they would have to be the same with Galilee, which our Saviour much frequented), and the Alcoran from Mount Paran;" which they fancy is a mountain not far from Mecca (see Dr. Poolecock upon Greg. Abulfaraj, p. 1S3, and Guadagnolus Resp. pro Relig. Christians). But the last words of this verse, for them, are sufficient to confute these conceits; for they plainly show that the whole verse speaks of the people of Israel.
CHAPTER XXXIII.

4 Moses commanded us a law, even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob. 5 And he was king in Jeshurun, when the heads of the people and the tribes of Israel were gathered together.

He came with ten thousands of saints:] Or, as our Mr. Mede thinks it should be translated, "with his holy ten thousands," or "myriads:" that is, attended with an innumerable company of angels, who waited on him at the giving of the law. See Ps. Ixviii. 7; Dan. vii. 10, of which Enoch, perhaps, was the part; Judg. 14, 15. And from hence it may be thought, that notion of the Jewish doctors, followed by St. Stephen and St. Paul, that the law was given by angels, had its beginning (Mede, book ii. p. 457); that is, they attended upon God, as his ministers, when he himself gave the law.

From his right hand:] With which we are wont to deliver the vessels or presents on such occasions.

Went a fiery law for them:] For the law of Moses was given out of the midst of fire, and therefore called a fire of law, as the words are in the Hebrew (Exod. xix. 16, 18; Deut. iv. 11, 12, v. 22—25). The cabalists (as Reuchlin observes) fancy that God wrote the law in a globe of fire, and sent it to them. But the Targum upon it is this sense, which interprets it, "He stretched his right hand out of the midst of flames of fire, and gave the law unto people." And Onkelos still better, "The law written with his right hand he gave us out of the midst of fire." Or, as Campeg. Vitringa would have it, this latter part of the verse translated, "On his right hand a fiery hand out of the fire a law for them, thence." The meaning being, that God came to Mount Sinai with that fire; for, in Scripture, to be on the right hand of any one, is to accompany him (lib. ii. Observ. Sacr. cap. 4).

By the conclusion of this verse it is apparent, that the former part of it belongs entirely to God's mercy unto the children of Israel, upon whom he bestowed his presence in a marvellous manner of his providence. Which makes it highly probable, that his "rising up from Seir upon them, and shining from Mount Paran," belongs to the same matter; that is, the cloud wherein he descended on Sinai, with a vast host of angels, extended itself so far, as to cover the neighbouring mountains of Seir and Paran. Though the meaning may be, as I have shown, that he continued his presence with them after they went from Sinai, through all their journeys in the wilderness of Seir and Paran, till they came to the place where they now were.

Ver. 3. Yet, he loved the people:] All this was the effect of his love and kindness to the people of Israel, whom he owned for his son, and his first-born (Exod. iv. 27, 28, in most of their languages, he is in a tender manner of his presence brought them out of Egypt (Exod. xix. 4), that he might instruct them in his laws. "All his saints are in thy hand:" Whereby he made them a holy nation (as it there follows in Exod. xix. 5), whom he took into his special care and most gracious protection, as this phrase signifies in many places, as in Deut. xxv. 18, 19, "the mighty power whereby he brought them out of Egypt; but it may have respect to God's preservation and support of them, when he gave the law in such a terrible manner, that Moses himself quaked, and yet none of them received any harm. As for the change of the person from his to thy, it is very frequent in this language, particularly in Dan. ix. 4. And they sat down at thy feet:] The first word (which we translate sat down) being nowhere else found but here and Isa. i. 5, where it plainly hath another sense, but no doubt, as doth in this sentence of this text. But most agree in this of Sol. Jarchi, that as scholars sat at the feet of their master round about him, while he taught them their lesson, so the people encompassed the mount where God was, and heard his law, which he thence delivered. But it is a question whether there was such a custom of scholars in those days: and the people did not sit, but stood at the foot of the mount (Exod. xx. 18). Therefore Onkelos understands this of their sitting down, or pitching their tents, where the glorious cloud that led them rested (Num. x. 10, 23).

Every one shall receive of thy words:] This still is commonly referred to the people's receiving the law. But Onkelos hath it hath they were not bound "at the commandment of the Lord" (Num. x. 13). For so he interprets it, "They went forward according to thy word." And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these and the foregoing words; "Behold, they were led, and came to the foot of his cloud, and went forward and rested, according to the command of his word." It takes in also the other sense of the words (as the interpretation of the Numb. x. 15), in this manner, "Though he inflicted many chastisements upon them, yet they did not cease, nor desist from the doctrine of the law."

Ver. 4. Moses commanded us a law:] He commanded them to observe that law which God had given them, when he was about to depart from them. This he did in the 11th and 12th verses: (1, 3, p. 1, v. 31, xii. 1, &c.) He speaks of himself in the third person, which is very usual throughout all this book.

Even the inheritance of the congregation of Jacob:] As a peculiar blessing which God had bestowed on them, and on their posterity, above all other nations in the world (Deut. iv. 5), who, as they had not this law given to them, but they were not bound "at the commandment of the Lord," to observe it; as the Jews themselves concluded from this very place. Nor did they force anybody to embrace this law, when they made a conquest of a neighbouring country, but left them to their liberty, provided they would become proselytes of the gate; that is, forsake idolatry, and keep the common precepts enjoined to all mankind. Thus Maimonides interprets the word inherita in (see Schickard, in his Jus Religion, cap. 5, theolog. 17, and Grotius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. i. cap. 1, sect. 16).

The author of Etz-Hachajim, a M.S. highly valued by the famous Wagenseil, saith, That when a child began to speak, his father was bound to teach him this verse. In which, instead of יִתְנָה, "hereditary," which of the Jews hath it hath respect to their being espoused; as the law were espoused to the Jewish nation (see Wagenseil on Sota, p. 519, 520).

Ver. 5. And he was king in Jeshurun:] Or, "for he was king," that is, under God, the supreme ruler and governor of Israel; and therefore, in his name, and by his authority, required them to observe these laws. Which plainly shows he made the Jews his people, both civil and judicial. Which is excellently expressed by our Mr. Thorrildike, in his Review of the Rites of the Church, &c., p. 68, Let Reuben live, and not die; and let not his men be few.

And this is the blessing of Judah: and he said, Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah, and bring him unto his people: let his hands be sufficient for him; and be thou an help to him from his enemies.

Let his hands be sufficient for him.] To avenge him of his enemies, as he also explains it.

Be thou an help to him] Suffer them not to prevail over him, but give him the victory, when he fights with Barzabas, to distinguish these last two passages: "Let his hands exercise revenge upon his enemies in battles, and do thou support and sustain him against those that hate him."

This was notoriously fulfilled in this tribe, which was the most valiant and successful of all other. For in all their wars this tribe was the principal; and the safety of all the rest seems to have depended upon this. (See Judg. 1, 2, (K. xxix. 19.)) And in these places show that this was the most considerable tribe before they had kings; so after that it was able, together with Benjamin, to maintain its ground against the other ten tribes, and all other opposers.

Ver. 8. Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy holy one.] Continue in this tribe the high dignity of Moses, who was the Thummim, and Aaron the Urim; and this as a part of it, to approach him with urim and thummim (which gave Aaron the name of the saint of the Lord, Ps. cvi. 16), yet it comprehends all the rest of the priests and Levites in conjunction with him; for they were all separated unto the Lord, having signalized themselves (as we speak) by their early zeal for the Lord, whom they consecrated, and appointed to this. Of which Moses takes notice in the next verse, "Who said unto his father, &c. I have not seen him," &c., regarded, that is, no relation, when they executed the commands of God against the worshippers of the golden calf. See our learned Dr. Spencer, De Leg. Hebr. lib. iii. cap. 7, dissert. 7, where he treats also of these words, as they may be applied to our Lord Christ, the true holy one of God; who is, indeed, a priest for ever, holy, harmless, undefiled, separate from sinners, &c. (Heb. vii. 26).

Whom thou didst prove at Massah, Or, "whom thou hast thoroughly proved." For the words in the Hebrew are, "Whom in proving thou didst prove:"

the ancient interpreters not taking Massah for the name of a place, but understanding there for the word of the Lord, which they pronounced to be a name, and apportioned it to this tribe; the name Massah signifies, "This is troublesome."

Which Moses had established. But, as before he was to be the royal tribe, according to the prophecy of Jacob, which Moses was assured God would fulfill, and therefore prays as follows: "And he said, Hear, Lord, the voice of Judah." Grant his petition when he calls for help against his enemies. So Onkelos paraphrases it, "Hear his prayer when he goes forth to war."

Bring him unto his people.] Return him home in peace unto his people; as the same Onkelos expounds it.

8 ¶ And of Levi he said, Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy holy one, whom thou didst prove at Massah, and with whom thou didst strive at the waters of Meribah;

9 Who said unto his father and to his mother, I have not seen him; neither did he acknowledge his brethren, nor knew his own children: for they have observed thy word, and kept thy covenant.

10 They shall teach Jacob thy judgments, and Israel thy law: they shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt sacrifice upon thine altar.

11 Bless, Lord, his substance, and accept the work of his hands: smite through the joints of them that rise against him, and of them that hate him, that they rise not again.

12 ¶ And of Benjamin he said, The beloved of the Lord shall dwell in safety by him, and the LORr shall cover him all the day long, and he shall dwell between his shoulders.

13 ¶ And of Joseph he said, Blessed of the they might have sufficient sustenance for themselves and their family. It is a strange fancy of some of the Jews, that whosoever offered incense grew rich, and therefore no priest was suffered to offer incense more than once in a year, for fear they might be derived to them all. Thus they trifle, while their hearts are set on getting money, and not on growing good (see Sheringham on Joma, p. 33, 36, and Maurits, De Sertitione Hebræorum, cap. 24, sect. 4).

Accep the work of his hand?] All their ministry at the altar where the priests officiated; or about the tabernacle, of which the Levites were a part.

Smithe through the joints of them that rise against him.] For they who were enemies to the priests and Levites were enemies to religion, and to all civil government, which was chiefly administered by them, as was before observed (see xvii. 8—12).

Ver. 12. Of Benjamin he said.] He mentions him next to Levi, because the temple, in which the priests officiated, was partly situated in his lot, and its revenue derived to them all.

The beloved of the Lord.] Or, being beloved of the Lord, as the LXX. interpret it, ἡ ἀγαπηθεισά ὑπὸ Κυρίου.

Shall dwell in safety by him.] j. e. By the Lord; which signifies the stability of his portion, which had Jerusalem the holy city in it, as we read Josh. xviii. 1—13. For though Simon, the chief priest, was exiled by God, and our Mr. Thorndike, in his Religious Assemblies, ch. 2, where he observes, the teaching here mentioned consists in declaring the meaning and obligation of the law in matters doubtful; as is apparent from Lev. xix. 8—11. For though others might be members of their courts of judgment, yet they consisted chiefly of priests and Levites. As for teaching the people in their religious assemblies, that was not so great an office of the priests and Levites as of the prophets. For though the prophets, and the disciples of the prophets, were commonly priests and Levites (who, being most free from the cares of estates and inheritances, and by their office, in this ceremonial service, came nearest to God of all other men, were most likely to be endowed with an extraordinary degree of knowledge, and of the fear of God), yet it is certain, that the charge of teaching the people in their assemblies belonged as well to those prophets who were not priests and Levites as to those that were (see him, p. 25). And this was one reason, as Maimonides observes, why the tribe of Levi might have no inheritance in the land, that they might be exalted above the tribute of ploughing and sowing, &c., they might wholly attend to the study of the law, and be able to teach Israel God's judgments (More Nevoehim, par. iii. cap. 39).

They shall put incense before thee, and whole burnt sacrifice] This was the peculiar office and honour of the priests alone, to offer incense on the golden altar, and burnt-offerings upon the brazen. The Jerusalem Targum thus paraphrases it, They shall put incense of precious spice before thee, to pacify thine anger, and offer a most acceptable sacrifice upon thine altar."

Ver. 11. Bless, Lord, his substance.] The word we here translate substance, is translated wealth, viii. 17, 18, which consisted most in cattle (they having no land to till), which he prays God to increase, that 17 His glory is like the firstling of his bullock, and his horns are like the horns of unicorns: with them he shall push the people together to the phrases) dwells in the heavens, and was revealed to Moses in the bush" (Exod. iii. 2, 4). That is, the Shekinah, as it is called in a most glorious manner, and the Lord told Moses he was there present, whose good-will, which is the fountain of all blessings (for to it they owed their deliverance out of Egypt, which God then promised to Moses out of the bush), he wished might be the peculiar portion of Joseph.

Let the blessing come upon the head of Joseph. The word blessing is not in the Hebrew, but this being one of the common things with the foregoing blessings, it is a prayer, that the good-will of God, the fountain (as I said) of all blessings, may rest upon Joseph. Or, as Onkelos translates it, "Let all those things (before named) come upon the head of Joseph." And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds it, "Let all these blessings come, and be made perfect upon the head of Joseph."

Upon the top of—him that was separated from his brethren. That is, saith the same Targum, "upon him that was made ruler over all the land of Egypt, and splendid in the honour given him by his brethren" (see this explained upon Gen. xlii. 26).

Ver. 17. His glory is like the firstling of his bullock. The ancients thought there was so much majesty in the countenance of a bull, especially of a young bullock, that they compared it in its prime, lifting up its head, that they made it an emblem of kingly power, as Bochartus hath shown out of several good authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 29. And accordingly here it signifies, that the tribe of Ephraim should have royal authority established in it. For he doth not compare the person of Joseph to a young bullock, but the tribe of Joseph, because he was a goodly man eminent for his beauty and comely proportions, Gen. xxxix. 6, but the tribes which sprang from him, as appears from the last words of this verse; whose glory he here comparing to that of a young bullock, and its glory consisting in its strength, the power of the tribes of Joseph is hereby denoted; which was so great, that they were the chief support of the kingdom of Israel, which began in Jeroboam, who was king of ten tribes; after whom there followed a long race of kings till the captivity. There may be also some respect in these words unto Joshua the first governor of all the people, who was of the tribe of Ephraim; as of Manasseh were Jair, Ephthah, and Gideon, who were famous men among the judges.

It is remarkable also here, that Joseph is compared to the firstling of a bullock, because Reuben being set aside for his incest, Joseph had the right of primogeniture, in part, translated unto him (I Chron. v. 1, 2), and, in consequence of it, had a double portion in the land of Canaan.

It is to be noted likewise, that he is said to be like unto the firstling of his bullock, because there were not more kindly bullocks anywhere than in Bashan (Amos iv. 1), which fell to the share of some of the children of Manasseh (Josh. xvii. 5).

There have been some great men, who, from this place and other conjectures, have fancied that Joseph was worshipped in Egypt after his death, under the tain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck of the abundance of the seas, and of treasures hid in the sand.

19 And of Zebulun he said, Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents.

19 They shall call the people unto the mountain, form of an ox, by the name of Scarips, which Bochartus hath confuted in the book forenamed, cap. 34. His horns are like the horns of unicorns.] This is a farther description of the power and strength of the house of Joseph; for a horn is everywhere an emblem of mighty power and force, and an unicorn a stately creature. But Bochartus hath alleged a great many things to prove, that reem is a sort of wild goat in Arabia, as big as a deer, and of the same colour, which they now call gazellas (par. i. Hierozoicen, lib. iii. cap. 47). There were some of them sent lately to the French king by the divan of Tripoli, which had black horns, in shape like those of a goat, only they were a foot and a half painted. But the smallness, strength, and swiftness of this creature, together with its fierce untameable nature, hath made Ludolphus (who at first was of Bochart's opinion) to conclude, upon second thoughts, that the reem in Scripture signifies the rhinozeros, as the Vulgar Latin here translates the word. See lib. i. Comment. in Histor. Ethiciop. cap. 10, n. 74, which seems not so well to agree with these words of Moses; which suppose the creature here spoken of to have two horns (he using the plural number), with which the two tribes descended from Joseph are very fitly compared. And so David mentions the horns of the reem (Ps. xxii. 22). But whatsoever creature it was, princes and great men were wont to be compared to it, as appears from Gen. xiv. 17. Of Edom are called unicorns, as in the following words they are compared to bullocks and bulls.

With them he shall push the people.] Throw down all that oppose him, particularly the Canaanites. For these (saith the Jerusalem Targum) are the great men of the Amorites, whom Joshua, the son of Nun, slew; when he was at the head of the tribe of Ephraim, and the captains which Gideon, the son of Joash, slew, who was of the tribe of Manasseh.

To the ends of the earth.] Of the land of Canaan. They are the ten thousands of Ephraim, and they are the thousands of Manasseh.] These things shall be performed by the numerous armies of Ephraim and Manasseh. Of these are the benefactions of these two tribes; the younger of which signifies he shall be more powerful than the elder, according to the prophecy of Jacob (Gen. xlvi. 19).

Ver. 18. Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out.] About their business, as the Jerusalem Targum expounds it, that is, their merchandise; which they exercised upon the sea of Gennessaret, where they were situated, and not far from the tribe of Ephraim, and the captives which Gideon, the son of Joash, slew, who was of the tribe of Manasseh. There are those who understand this of their going out to war against their enemies, which is the exposition of Onkelos. And so this phrase is often used, particularly in Gen. vi. 8; and the valuation of this tribe is, upon one occasion, celebrated in Judges, v. 18. But Jacob's prophecy determines us rather to the other sense, Gen. xlix. 13, where he represents this tribe as mariners rather than soldiers. Though it must be acknowledged, that there were great numbers among them in David's time, who were expert warriors (1 Chron. xii. 33), and that the Israelites generally were not addicted to traffic, the sea-coast being possessed by the Philistines and the Canaanites, save only what belonged to this tribe.

Ver. 20. Blessed be he that enlargeth God.] That is, blessed be God, who hath added to him such a large inheritance; which he afterward also farther enlarged, as we read 1 Chron. v. 18—20.

He dwelleth as a lion.] Lives secure and fearless, though encompassed with enemies, whom the Gadites tore in pieces (as it here follows) if they offered to molest them. For this was a very warlike tribe, as we learn from 1 Chron. xii. 8, and therefore here compared to a lioness (so labi signifies), which equals a lion, if not exceeds him, in strength and fierceness; as Bochartus hath observed out of good authors in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 50. And so Onkelos here translates it, "He dwelleth as a lioness." And the Jerusalem Targum puts in both after this manner; because there, in a portion of the lawgiver, was he seated; and he came with the heads of the people, he executed the justice of the Lord, and his judgments with Israel.

22 ¶ And of Dan he said, Dan is a lion's whelp: he shall leap from Bashan.

23 ¶ And of Naphtali he said, O Naphtali, he remains quiet, as a lion and a lioness; neither is there people or kingdom that shall stand before them.

Teareth the arm with the crown of the head.] Kills the prince with their kings, as Onkelos truly explains it. For by arms are meant men of strength, and power; and by the crown of the head is properly to be understood the chief commander, ruler, or king. And therefore the LXX. also translate, "crown of the head" by Δοταρα, prince, or supreme governor.

Ver. 21. He provided the first part for himself. He first received his portion in the land which they conquered, as Onkelos expounds it. Which he is said here to provide for himself, because this tribe (with Reuben, and part of Manasseh), desired to be possessed of the country of Sihon, which was accordingly given to them (Numb. xxxii. 1, 2, 33).

Because there, in a portion of the lawgiver. Which Moses (who was his lawgiver) gave them by God's order; whereas the other nine tribes and a half had theirs given them by Joshua.

Was he seated?] The word in the Hebrew signifies hid, i.e. protected, when, going to the war in Canaan, they left their wives, and children, and cattle, without any defence, but God's providence, according to the promise they made to Moses (Numb. xxxii. 16, 17, &c.). What the Jerusalem Targum, and Onkelos, and Theodoret, explain, is wholly strange, and abominable, even in itself: here say, of Moses being buried in this tribe (which they make the sense of these words), I think is no more to the purpose, than what the cabalists observe upon this place, that, in the blessing of God, the whole alphabet is found, because Moses our master (saith Baal-Haturim) was buried in his territory, who observed the law from aleph to tav, i.e. from the beginning to the end (see Theodoric Hucksplan, Cab. Judaica, n. 10).

He came] He speaks of this as a thing already done, because he certainly foresaw they would perform their engagement.

With the heads of the people.] With the chief commanders of the rest of the tribes of Israel. Or, as the word may be translated more literally, "He came, the heads of the people;" i.e. the Gadites marched in the front before the children of Israel. For so was the agreement between Moses and them, as we read in Numb. xxxii. 17, that they should "go ready-armed before the children of Israel." Of which engagement Joshua put them in mind when they were entering into Canaan (Josh. i. 14), and they stood to it (ver. 14, 17).

He executed the justice of the Lord.] Upon the seven nations of Canaan, whom God commanded them to extirpate.

His judgments with Israel.] Going in the foremost of the Israelites to battle, till the whole country was subdued to them (Numb. xxxii. 21, 22, 29; Josh. xxi. 9, 13, 19).

Ver. 22. Dan is a lion's whelp.] Courageous as a young lion; so Onkelos. Which was most eminently verified in Samson, who was of this tribe; and whom "the Spirit of the Lord began to move in the camp of Dan" (Judg. xiii. 29).

He shall leap from Bashan.] The tribe of Dan had no inheritance near Bashan; but he compares them to the young lions of that place. For lions haunted mountains (Cant. iv. 8), and this mountain in particular was famous for them, and bred very fierce ones; which every one knows leap upon their prey, when they assault it, and fasten their nails and their teeth in it in a moment. And so the heart of Onkelos, and the authors describe them, par. i. Hierozoicon, lib. iii. cap. 2, p. 739. And thus did the Danites on a sudden leap from one end of Judah to another, and seized on the city of Laish, near to the fountain of Jordan, calling it by the name of Dan, as we read Judges, xviii. 39.

Ver. 23. O Naphtali, satisfied with favour.] That is, with the favour of God, which is explained in the next words.

Full with the blessing of the Lord.] The word full, as Maimonides observes, signifies that which is most perfect and absolute in its kind (More Nevyoch, par. i. cap. 19). Such was the country of Galilee, wherein this tribe had their possession, which was more to Παπανία και πολλαία, c., (as Josephus speaks, lib. iii. De Bell. Judaica, cap. 4), "full throughout in all its parts, and very fertile," planted with all manner of trees, insomuch that it invited him to husbandry, who was averse to labour; and by that means was entirely inhabited, and had no void space in all the country, &c.

Possess thou the west and the south.] The same Josephus says, this tribe to have possessed the east and the north in the upper Galilee (lib. v. Antiq. cap. 1, p. 112), which is directly contrary to what Moses here saith; therefore Bochartus (in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 18), judiciously expounds these words of Moses, not with respect to the whole land of Canaan, but to the Danites before mentioned. For the portion of Naphtali extended from the south of the city called Dan, or Laish, to the sea of Tiberias. And so the three Chaldee paraphrasts expound the Hebrew word jam (which we translate west) by the sea of Tiberias, or Gennesaret, which is the same; for the Hebrews call great lakes by the name of seas. And by this sea is not meant the Mediterranean, but the sea of Galilee, or Tiberias, or Gennesaret; for by all these names it is called, as Mr. Selden observes in his Merc Clausum, p. 21.

Ver. 24. Let Asher be blessed with children.] With a numerous and beautiful issue.

Let him be acceptable to his brethren.] All the rest of the Israelites shall court them, for their goodly aspect; or (as some rather think), he prophesies this tribe should win the favour and affection of others from their affable and obliging behaviour; for which Jacob predicts they should be famous (Gen. xlv. 21).

Let him dip his foot in oil.] Be planted in a rich soil, full of olive-trees; which should make oil so plentiful, that they might not only wash their faces, but their feet in it. Onkelos translates, "He shall be nourished with the delights of kings."

Ver. 25. Thy shoes shall be iron and brass.] Or, as in the margin, "Under thy feet shall be iron;" which hath made some think these minerals were digged out of Libanus, near to which lay the tribe of Asher; who, according to this exposition, trod upon a soil full of iron and brass. But no author, Bochartus saith, mentions any such thing as the brass of Libanus; and therefore some understand by these expressions, the 26 ¶ There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, who rideth upon the heavens in thy help, and in his excellency on the sky.

27 The eternal God is thy refuge, and underneath are the everlasting arms: and he shall barbarous people that dwelt in Galilee of the gentiles, who pressed the Asserites, as an iron shoe: or fitters do the feet. But the Arabic here by minah, which we translate shoe, understands a bolt or bar: and renders this passage, "Thy bolts shall be iron and brass;" that is, as Onkelos expresses it, "They should be as strong as iron and brass." And so Kimchi, expounding the words of Jonathan (who interprets it, "Thy habitation shall be as strong," &c.), saith the meaning is, "Their country should be as well fenced, as if it had been shut up in brazen or iron walls;" and R. Solomon to the same purpose (see Hierozoicus, par. ii. lib. vi. cap. 16). But I have observed, that the same Bochartus acknowledges in his Phaleg, that Sarepta, (which the Hebrews call Zarephath, 1 Kings xvii. 9), a city of Sidon, had its name derived from this observation; Nam Sidon et Sarepta, quae a metallis excepse undique nomen habuit, in tribu Asser furent, "For Sidon and Sarepta, which had its name from the melting of metals there, were in the tribe of Asher."

"As thy days so shall thy strength be." The same Chytraeus expounds it, "All the time of their life, they should have in vigour of body and mind." Which seems to be the sense of Onkelos, "As the days of thy youth, so shall thy strength be." And the Jerusalem Targum more expressly, "Such as they were in the days of their youth, such should they be in their old age." Or simply, these words signify, that this tribe should "grow stronger and stronger," which Hebringer seems to have aimed at, when he observes, "It is the tribe of Asher, which (in the Orientale, cap. 7, As are thy days, so are thy riches and wealth." Masius, quite contrary, upon Josh. xix. 31, interprets these words to signify, that they should have perpetual conflicts with the old inhabitants of the country. All which various interpretations proceed from the uncertain signification of the Hebrew word dabar, which we render strength.

Ver. 26. There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun.] And now, having blessed every particular tribe, he concludes with this general demonstration of their happiness, that their God was not like the gods of other nations, but super-eminent in all perfections. And therefore they must needs be blessed (as the same Chytraeus explains it), who had him propitious to them, as their keeper, their defender, avenger, and saviour from all their enemies.

Who rideth upon the heavens in thy help.] Who commandeth in the heavens, as well as in the earth; and sends help and succour to thee from hence by thunder, lightning, and hailstones; as we read he did in many places (Ps. xviii. 8, 9, &c., lxxxviii. 32—35). And as he that rideth upon a horse, turns him this way, and that way, as he pleaseth (they are the words of Maimonides in his More Nevochim, par. i. cap. 70), so God by his power and pleasure commandeth the heavens; and is not fixed to them, as the soul of them (which was the foolish opinion of the Zabih), but, as the rider is far more honourable and excellent than the beast on which he sits, and of a quite dif-

different species from it; so God is represented by this metaphor (though but in a weak manner), as separate from the heavens, and of a more excellent nature, far transcending them, which are but the instruments he uses, to fulfil his will and pleasure.

In his excellency on the sky.] Or, as it may be translated word in the magnificence, the clouds. From whence he sends such storms and tempests, as demonstrate his power.

Ver. 27. The eternal God is thy refuge.] Or, "dwelling-place;" to whom they might always betake themselves for safety, and never fail of it (Ps. xc. 1). In the Hebrew the words are, "The eternal God is the habitation," or dwelling-place; from whence the Jews have framed 1 Kings to preserve all men from having low thoughts of God, as if he was contained in any thing, "God is the place wherein the world dwells, and not the world the place where God dwells." So Maimonides observes in the place above named, out of Beresheith Rabba.

Underneath are the everlasting arms.] To support all these, with an anointed power and care, who commit themselves unto him.

He shall thrust out the enemy from before thee.] As he had carried them through the wilderness with an unwearyed care, so he promises God would expel the Canaanites, and make room for them in their country.

Shall say, Destroy them.] Give the Israelites power, as well as authority, to root them out. For to say here is as much as to do, and therefore signifies executing their destruction.

Ver. 28. Israel then shall dwell in safety alone.] Live in quiet and peace, separate from all other people; or, the Divine protection shall be sufficient for their security. This Rashi thinks was fulfilled in the days of Solomon (see 1 Kings x. 29): but others of them think it still is to be fulfilled.

The fountain of Jacob.] That is, his posterity, who flowed from him as a river from a fountain (Isa. lxviii. 1, li. 1). Cocceius thinks these words should be joined to the foregoing in this manner, "Israel shall dwell in safety alone by the fountain of Jacob," that is, by God. But the ancients may have some countenance from the ancient interpreters (as I shall observe presently), yet most go the other way; there being the like expression in Ps. lxviii. 26, "Bless the Lord in the congregation, from the fountain of Israel;" or, as it is in the margin, "Ye that be of the fountain of Israel;" i.e. are derived from him as your Father.

Shall be upon a land of corn and wine; also his heavens shall drop down dew.] In a fruitful country, upon which the heavens shall drop down refreshing dews. Onkelos paraphrases the whole thus, "Israel shall dwell securely alone, according to the blessing wherewith Jacob's father blessed them, in a land of corn," &c. And so the Jerusalem Targum (making more express mention of the word fountain, which he translates by himself securely, from the fountain of benefaction wherewith Jacob blessed them, in a land producing wine and oil; and the heavens above are commanded to send dews and rain upon them.

Ver. 29. Happy art thou, O Israel.] He was not able farther to express their happiness, and therefore breaks out into admiration of it; exalting them thereby to be deeply sensible of it, and affected with it.
29 Happy art thou, O Israel: who is like unto thee? O people saved by the Lord, the shield of thy help, and who is the sword of thy excellency; and thine enemies shall be found liars unto thee; and thou shalt tread upon their high places.

Who is like unto thee? Who had the Lord for their God, as he said before, ver. 26, &c., and iv. 7, 8. O people saved by the Lord.] Who have been redeemed by his mighty power. So the Jerusalem Targum, "Whose redemption (I suppose he meant out of Egypt) is from the presence of the Lord." Who had preserved them ever since, and would still protect them, as it here follows. Thus R. Isaac (in Chissuk Emona, par. i. cap. 18) saith, signifies the spiritual blessings God bestowed on them. For true felicity (saith he) doth not consist in victory over enemies, and plenty of corn, or suchlike things, of which he had spoken before in the foregoing verse, but in the salvation of the soul, of which no nation in the world was secure but the Jews; which made Moses (saith he) break out into these words, "O happy people saved by the Lord!" As much as to say, Among all people, is there any saved like to thee? This he saith, because Christians were wont to tell them that they fixed their minds wholly on the corporal felicity which their law promised them; which made him look about to find out all that he could draw to a higher sense. And he fixes so much upon these words, that he repeats it again and little after, that the salvation here promised is everlasting. And yet his eyes could not he open to see that this salvation was to be brought to them by the Messiah: and that our Lord Jesus is he, whose gospel is as full of such promises as their law is of the promises of corn, and wine, and oil.

CHAP. XXXIV.

Ver. 1. Moses went up] Having thus declared his affectionate concern for the happiness of every one of them, he took his leave of the elders and all the people, and went up whither God had commanded him (xxxii. 49, &c.). From the plains of Moab.] In which was their last station before they entered into Canaan, Numb. xxxii. 48—50, where God delivered several commands to them, Numb. xxxv. 1, xxxvi. 13, and where Moses spake to them what we read in this book, Deut. i. 5. Unto the mountain of Nebo.] Which was the highest part of the mountain of Abarim, as appears from Numb. xxv. 12, compared with Deut. xxxii. 49. Near to which there was a city of the same name (Numb. xxxiii. 38; Isa. xv. 2). Top of Pisgah.] Which was the very top of the mountain Nebo (see Deut. iii. 27; Numb. xxi. 29). That is over against Jericho.] A famous city on the other side of Jordan. I see no ground to believe that the people of Israel accompanied him thither (as Josephus tells the story), with so many tears that Moses wept also; and having besought them not to take his departure so heavily, he dismissed them together with the elders, and remained there alone.

The Lord.] Or, as Jonathan hath it, "the Word of the Lord shewed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan, 2 And all Naphtali, and the land of Ephraim, the land," who had accompanied him with his blessed presence through the wilderness. Shewed him all the land of Gilead, unto Dan.] God had often promised him that he should see the good land promised to their fathers, though not be permitted to enter into it (Numb. xxxvi. 13; Deut. iii. 27). And now fulfils his word, and gives him a full prospect of it; bidding him first look northwards, through the whole land of Gilead (which comprehends all that was given to the two tribes and half on this side Jordan, where they now were) to the land of Naphtali, which was in the upper Galilee, beyond the sea of Gennesaret, as far as the utmost northern border, which was then called Laish, and afterwards Dan (Josh. xix. 47, Judges xviii. 29), and in latter times Cesarea Philippi. The possession of Dan, which was not the name of this place till after that tribe had conquered Laish in the time of the Judges, shows that this was not written at the same time with the rest of this book, no more than what we read (ver. 5, 6, 10) of his death and burial, &c., (unless we suppose Moses to have given an account of his own death and burial by the spirit of prophecy, which is not probable), but it is most likely by Samuel, who was a prophet, and wrote by Divine authority what he found in the records which were left by Joshua and others who sucand Manasseh, and all the land of Judah, unto the utmost sea, 3 And the south, and the plain of the valley of Jericho, the city of palm trees, unto Zoar.
4 And the Lord said unto him, This is the land which I sware unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, saying, I will give it unto thy seed: I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes, but thou shalt not go over thither.

5 ¶ So Moses the servant of the Lord died there in the land of Moab, according to the word of the Lord.

This is the land] Gen. xii. 7, xiii. 15, xv. 18, &c.
I have caused thee to see it with thine eyes] Which the Lord strengthened, it is likely, with a greater power than usual. The sight of the country, as a prospect than otherwise he could have done of this country. Or, as some of the Jews understand it, he laid a map of it before his eyes, wherein every part of it was exactly described. But that might have been done in the plains of Moab, without going up into a mountain; therefore the other is more reasonable, that he strengthened his visive faculty with greater power, to see the whole country in its length and breadth, &c. And therefore some of the rabbins have been so wise as to put both together, as J. Bened. Carpozovius observes out of several of them (upon Schickard's Jus Regium, cap. 5, theor. 16, p. 285), who thus speak: *God showed him the whole land, as in a garden plot, forty miles in breadth, and as many in length; and gave his eyes such a power over the air, as comprehended the whole land, from the beginning to the end, that he saw hills and dales, what was open and what was enclosed, remote or nigh, at one view."

Thou shalt not go over thither] This he had often said to him: and now mentions it, that he might die in a comfortable sense that he had been as good as his father and grandfather, and was consecrated to the service of God, as long as he was with him into the other world, that he would make good the oath which he swore to their fathers, of bringing them into Canaan, and there fulfil all that he had foretold.

Ver. 5. So Moses the servant of the Lord] So God himself calls him after his death, in the next book, Josh. i. 2, 7, as the most eminent minister of his that he had hitherto employed in Israel. But the observation of R. Bechiai is not well founded, that he is not called "the servant of the Lord" till after he was dead, and then admitted into the nearest familiarity with the Divine Majesty: for though these very words are not used, yet the Lord calls him "my servant Moses," which is the same thing. Num. xii. 7:

Died there in the land of Moab.] For this country was still so called, because it anciently belonged to the Moabites (see Num. xxxii. 26), from whom Sion had taken it, as Israel now had taken it from him: so that he really died in the land of Israel.

According to the word of the Lord] The Jerusalem Targum explains this very soberly, "According to the sentence of my God." So the Targum of the Jews. And the Lord had determined and declared he should, xxxii. 49, 50. And so this phrase is commonly used in this very book, xvii. 6, 10, 11, as well as in other places of the Pentateuch, Num. ix. 20, xili. 3, &c., which will warrant this interpretation, that Moses did not die of any disease, nor was worn out with age, but merely hastened, as the prophet of all things, so ordered it. But some of the Jews, not satisfied with this, have far-fetched conceits concerning the death of Moses from these words: for because it is said he died, al pi., "at the mouth (as the words are literally in the Hebrew) of the Lord," Maimonides himself saith, that their wise men think (and he seems of their opinion), that it signifies the Lord drew his soul out of his body with a kiss. And thus died Aaron and Miriam, but none besides them. Of Aaron indeed it is expressly said, he died al pi, "of the Lord," but it is not said of Miriam; and yet they will have her to have had the same favour; that is, they died, saith he, of too much love, from the pleasure they had in the thoughts of God; which apprehension of God, conjunct with the highest love to him, he thinks is called kissing (Cant. i. 2), "Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth" (More Nevocim, par. iii. cap. 51). But this is not the meaning of the phrase, though Moses departed this life in a most delectable sense and taste of the Divine love, having no unwillingness to die, nor being surprised with death; for he knew the time, and the place, and the manner of it: and as he did not die of any disease (as was said before), or of old age, or by external force, but only by the will and pleasure of God, who took his soul out of his body; so did not part with it against his will, nor upon any fear, but with a placid mind and composed spirit committed himself to God, in whose embraces (as we may speak) he expired: and this is it likely the ancient Jews meant, when they said "his soul departed with a kiss.

As to the time of his death, the Scripture doth not mention of it, nor month and the day, although the Jews commonly place it in the last month of the fortieth year after their coming out of Egypt, called Adar, and the seventh day of that month. Thus they say, in Seder Olam Rabba, cap. 10, and in their calendar which they now follow; and so Patricides in Hottinger's Suggesta Orientalis, p. 437. But our great primate of Ireland in his Annals observes, that it is not the custom of the Hebrews, to place his death in the first day of that month; and Torniellus makes the same computation, that it must be either in the latter end of the eleventh month, or in the beginning of the twelfth.

Ver. 6. He buried him] This refers to the words foregoing; viz. the Lord, who commanded his angels to take him up in a cloud, gave him a very happy sepulchre. And his body is said to have been buried in Archar the Charchael (see Cant. i. 2), and mentioned in Jer. xxv. 19, &c. Heb. ix. p. 25, and see p. 600. Though in the Scripture active words are very often used passively, and the meaning be only that he was buried, yet there is this to be said for the other sense, that thereupon it is thought, that the contest arose between Michael the archangel and the devil (as St. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Procopius Gezaeus, and others take it), who would not have had him buried, but opposed it, that he might administer an occasion to the Jews to commit idolatry; though we never find that the Jews were given to the worship of relics, as our most learned Usher observes in his Annals (see there).

In a valley in the land of Moab, over against Beth-peor] This valley was in the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, as I noted before, and was now possessed by the Israelites. And Beth-Peor was a part of the possession of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 90), which was a place where the temple of Peor anciently stood; from whence it had its name: for this idol is not only called Baal-Peor, but simply Peor (Josh. xxii. 17); and as Beth-Baal is the temple of Baal, so Beth-Peor is the temple of Peor, as I. Ger. Vossius observes, De Orig. et Pror. Idol, lib. ii. cap. 7.

Now by all these circumstances of his burial, it appears how frivolous that opinion of the Jews is, mentioned in Jalkut, out of Siphri, that Moses did not really die, but was translated into heaven, where he stands and ministers before God; which conceit Josephus himself follows, lib. iv. Antiq. cap. 8, where he saith, that he having dismissed the elders, who went with him to Mount Abarim, and then conversing awhile with Eleazar and Joshua, while he embraced them, "εν αυτω καταρεσας αποικια σωθησεται," "a cloud on a sudden coming upon him," he was snatched out of their sight into a certain valley: which is not only beside, but contrary to the Scripture, which saith he died, and was buried in the valley. And yet some of the ancient fathers, particularly St. Ambrose and Hilary, and the Jewish Commentators, do not say Moses is said to die, it doth not signify the separation of his soul from his body, but his translation to a better life. See Sixtus Senensis, in his Bibliotheca, lib. v. Annot. 61, where he observes, this is not only against Scripture, but against the sense of almost all ecclesiastical writers.

No man kneweth of his sepulchre unto this day.] These words were not written by Moses, as Josephus and Philo imagine, who say he wrote this by the spirit of prophecy (see ver. 1). The reason why his body was concealed most think to have been, lest in future times it should become an object of their worship. So R. Levi ben Gersom: "Future generations, perhaps, may want to do so, yet his death is not on record, to deprive them of the fame of his miracles: for do we not see how some of the Israelites erred, in the brazen serpent which Moses made?" And the heresy of the Melchisedekians shows this was no vain fear (as Hermannus Witsius observes, lib. i. Miscell. cap. 17), if Epiphanius may be believed, who saith, that in Arabia Petrea, &c. a Ιωαδα μετα των τετεθησεν, &c. "they thought, to worship the God of Moses," by this, the Jewish custom of venerating his image. What would they have done, if they had had his very body! which he did not desire to be carried into Canaan, and buried among his ancestors, as Joseph ordered concerning his bones: for he understood, it is likely, the mind of God to be, that, as he should not go over Jordan with them, yet his blotted-out, or corrupted, or his body should not be carried over when he was dead; which R. Channa thinks might have proved dangerous, because in the time of their distress (especially at the captivity of the land) the children of Israel might have been prone to run to his sepulchre, and beg him with tears to pray for them, whose prayers had been so prevalent for them in his lifetime: for such a piece of supernatural, it seems, crept in among them in latter ages; of which see Wagenseil upon the Gemara of Sota, cap. 1, sect. 52, annot. 2.

But though no man knew where Moses was buried when this was written, yet some Maronite shepherds, we are told, have pretended lately (1653) to find out his tomb, with this inscription in Hebrew, "Moses, the servant of the Lord, is buried here." But this story was made about it, as the same Witsius observes, out of Horius's Historia Ecclesiastica. But a learned Jew, he saith, so confuted the story, showing it was another Moses whose tomb they found, that the report presently vanished; and the learned Wagenseil makes some probable guesses, that it was the tomb of Moses Malmonoth (see Annot. 6, in Genesis Sota, cap. 1, sect. 51). But Bartholomaeus, in his late Bibliotheca Rabbinica, tom. iii. p. 928, &c. had made it very probable, that Horius was imposed upon by somebody in this narration, there being no such authors known among the Jews as R. Jakum, or Jacobus ben Gad, who, he saith, confuted this tale.

Ver. 7. Was an hundred and twenty years old when he died.] A third part of which time, wanting
The children of Israel wept for Moses in the plains of Moab thirty days: so the days of weeping and mourning for Moses were ended.

And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him: and the children of Israel heardkened unto him, and did as the Lord commanded Moses.

And there arose, not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face.

In all the signs and the wonders, which coming back, and then add the three days they lay by Jordan before they passed over (Josh. iii. 2), they make just a month and ten days, from the first day of the last month, when I suppose Moses died, unto the day they got safe over Jordan, which was the tenth day of the first month; whereas, if we reckon as the Jews do, that Moses died on the seventh day of the last month, it would have been the seventeenth day of the first month before they got over Jordan. I observe also, that, though the Talmudists generally make him to have died on the seventh day of Adar, yet there have been some who placed it on the first; for the Medrash Rabbah, telling the story of Hanan's casting lots to find the best time to do execution on the Jews, saith he was pitched upon the month Adar, because it had been unlucky to the Jews to be the death of their master Moses therein. But he did not consider, saith Medrash, that “as Moses died on the first day of this month, so he was born on the same first day.”

Ver. 9. And Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom] To take the government upon him, and manage it prudently, as soon as Moses left them; which was necessary to be mentioned, that it might not be thought they wanted a head to conduct them, as their neighbours possibly might imagine, when the news came of Moses's death: for, as the Samaritans tell the story, (in Hottinger's Synegma Orientale, p. 463,) when they heard the lamentations of the Jews, they took it for certain that Moses, having been so long, and so frequently, so long as he had been alive, to rejoice, and gather their forces together to set upon the Israelites, as wanting a leader: but they soon found themselves mistaken, Joshua having taken the charge of them, and being ended with his spirit.

For Moses had laid his hands upon him.] Whereby he committed to him the supreme authority after his departure, and implored the Spirit of God to qualify him for it; for power to execute any office among the Jews was given by laying on of hands, whereby they were ordained and appointed to it. And this was a rite of prayer also, as many have observed for the obtaining the gifts of the Spirit, which were necessary for the discharge of that office. And, though no words of prayer be mentioned, yet the very “laying on of hands” denotes it, as our learned Dr. Outram observes from this very place, and from 1 Tim. v. 22, lib. i. De Sacrific. cap. 15, n. 8. Of Moses's laying on hands upon Joshua, we read Numb. xxxvii. 15, &c. And he was solemnly also, a little before Moses's death, presented unto God, by his own command, xxxi. 14, &c.; as this shows.

Israel hearkened unto him.] Obeyed him as their supreme governor, according to God's command, delivered to Moses, Numb. xxvii. 20; Deut. xxxi. 23 (see Josh. i. 16, 17, &c.).

Ver. 10. There arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses.] This is a plain demonstration, that the promise God makes by Moses, that he would raise up a "Prophet like to him" (Deut. xviii. 15, 19, &c.), was not fulfilled either in Joshua or in Samuel (who it is likely wrote this chapter, as I said before), and the best of the Jews confess, shall not be fulfilled till Messiah come. Thus the author of Sephir Ikkarim, lib. iii. cap. 29, “It cannot be, but that a prophet shall at last arise like to Moses, or greater the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land, than he; for the king Messiah shall be as great or greater: therefore these words are not to be expounded, as if there should never be such a prophet, but that in all the time of the following prophets, till the cessation of prophecy, none should arise like to Moses. But after that, there shall be one like him, or rather greater than he."

Whom the Lord knew face to face.] Or, as De Dieu thinks it should be translated, "Who knew the Lord face to face." This was one pre-eminence of Moses above all the prophets, that he conversed more familiarly with God than any of them did. See Num. xii. 8, which place explains this: for "to know him face to face," was to speak familiarly to God, and to hear God speaking in like manner unto him. And so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these words; only instead of the Lord, he saith, "Who knew the Word of the Lord talking with him," and delivering to him most excellent laws, for the good government of his people. In which laws he still lives, they all remaining upon record to this day, when the laws of all the famous lawgivers, whom the gentiles honoured as gods are obliterated: but it must be observed, that in this wherein Moses excelled all the prophets, our blessed Saviour far transcended him: for he was "in the bosom of the Father" (John i. 18), and spake "what he saw and heard," &c. (Josh. iii. 11, 32).

Ver. 11.] The Jerusalem Targum hath it, "Which the Word of the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt, to Pharaoh, and to all his servants, and to all his land" (see iv. 34, vi. 22, vii. 19). In these signs and wonders Moses excelled all the prophets, doing more miracles than all that followed after him, as Maimonides observes, More Nevoch, par. ii. cap. 35. But our blessed Saviour excelled him in this, as well as them; doing more wonders than all the prophets put together had done from the beginning of the world, and far greater also than theirs (John xxi. ult.).

Ver. 12. In all that mighty hand, and in all the great terror which Moses shewed] As the former verse relates to what he did in Egypt, so this hath respect unto their passing through the Red Sea, and to all that befell them in the wilderness, both at the giving of the law, and afterward till this time: so the Jerusalem Targum expounds these words, "In all that strong hand, and in all those great visions, which Moses managed." And Onkelos to the same purpose.

In the sight of all Israel.] In the place forenamed, Maimonides insists much upon this, that Moses wrought all his miracles publicly, the whole congregation being witnesses of them. And so our Saviour commonly wrought his (till they sought to kill him) in their synagogues, at their public feasts, when there was the greatest concourse of the people of Israel: so that in this he was a prophet "like unto Moses," though infinitely superior; which some of the old Jews could not but discern (as I observed upon ch. xviii.), when upon these words of Isa. lii. 13, "He shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high," they thus gloss in Tanchuma, which is an ancient book among them, "This is the king Messias who shall be exalted above Abraham, exalted above Moses, and be very high above the angels of the ministry." Upon which Conradus Pellicanus thus glosses, and concludes his commentary, as I shall do mine, with these words: "What it is to be above the angels, let the Jews explain; we can understand nothing by it, but the very Word of God, which was in the beginning with God, and was God, by whom all things were made, and without him nothing was made, viz. the Lord God of hosts: to whom in perfect unity, God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit, be all honour, and glory for ever." Amen.

Thus ends the Pentateuch, which, as our great primate of Ireland computes, contains the history of two thousand five hundred and fifty-two years and a half, from the beginning of the world to the death of Moses.

THE BOOK OF JOSHUA.

Thus title doth not necessarily signify that this book was written by Joshua, as the five foregoing were by Moses, but only that it contains the acts done by Joshua. Yet there want not arguments to prove that Joshua was the author of this book: for though Grotius and many other modern writers, with some of the ancients, think they find reasons in the book itself against this opinion; yet the ancient Talmudists, and several of the later, ascribe it to him, being principally induced thereunto by those words in the last chapter of this book, ver. 26, which I cannot say are an evident proof of it (for those words may relate only to the covenant mentioned in that chapter); but thus they say expressly in Bava-bathra, cap. I, "Joshua wrote his own book, and the last eight verses of the law;" and then concerning the last five verses of this book, they write after this manner in the same place; "Eleazar wrote the twenty-ninth verse, &c. of the twenty-fourth: chapter, as Phinehas did ver. 33." And there are men of excellent learning who have undertaken to answer all that can be objected unto this (particularly Daniel Huetius, in his Demonstratio Evang. propos. 4). Which objections I shall consider in their proper places, where they seem to arise in this book.

Which the Jews reckon among the first prophets (as they call them), though it contain only a history of what passed till the death of Joshua; which, in all likelihood, he would not neglect to write himself, as Moses did what passed in his time, that every tribe and every family might have an unquestionable title to their inheritance under his own hand, who had by God's order made a division of the land; and that all posterity might see the promises made unto them by Moses were so punctually fulfilled, that there failed not aught of any good thing which the Lord had spoken, but all came to pass, as he observes xxv. 45, and that in a short time: for this book contains the history of the Israelites, from the death of Moses to the death of Joshua; that is, as some compute, for the space of seventeen years, or rather, near twenty-seven (see upon xiv. 10).

CHAPTER I.

1 The Lord appointeth Joshua to succeed Moses. 2 The borders of the promised land. 3 God promiseth to assist Joshua. 4 He giveth him instructions. 5 He prepareth the people to pass over Jordan. 6 Joshua putteth the two tribes and half in mind of their promise to Moses. 7 They promise him fealty.

1 Now after the death of Moses the servant of the Lord it came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying,

2 Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. After the death of Moses] Thus those books are wont to begin, whose argument relates to the book foregoing. As the book of Judges is in this manner connected with this of Joshua, and the book of Ruth with that of Judges; and the LXX. make such a preface to join the book of Lamentations with the prophecy of Jeremias.

After the death of Moses] I suppose immediately after the days of mourning for him were ended (Deut. xxxiv. 8).

The servant of the Lord] See Deut. xxxiv. 5.

It came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun.] Out of the sanctuary, it is most likely, from whence he had spoken to him a little before Moses's death, and made him a promise of what he orders him now to accomplish (Deut. xxxi. 14, 29), and where Eleazar was appointed long before to ask counsel for him, when there was great occasion (Num. xviii. 21).

Moses' minister.] Who had attended upon Moses from the beginning, in his highest employment (Exod. xxiv. 12; Deut. i. 38).

Ver. 2. Moses my servant is dead.] He hath finished his work, and can do me no farther service.

Now therefore arise.] Put an end therefore unto your mourning for him, and go about the business which he hath left thee to perform.

Go over this Jordan.] Within sight of which they lay encamped.

Unto the land which I do give to them.] As he promised when he changed his name from Oshea into Joshua (Numb. xiii. 16; Deut. i. 33, iii. 23).

Ver. 3. Every place] Within the limits mentioned in the next verse.

3 Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses.

4 From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast.

5 There shall not any man be able to stand

As I said unto Moses.] He would not have them doubt of what Moses said from him (Deut. xi. 24), though he were dead.

Ver. 4. From the wilderness] This was the bounds of the country on the south.

This Lebanon] Which was the bounds on the north. And Joshua seems now to have been in sight of it; to which the Divine Majesty directed his observation, as the most eminent mountain in those parts of the world.

Even unto the great river—Euphrates.] Which was the eastern bounds, and called by other authors the great river, as I have observed on Deut. i. 7.

All the land of the Hittites.] Who were a very powerful people in the country, dwelling, together with the Amorites, in the mountainous parts of it (Numb. xiii. 29), some of which were of the race of the giants, and are therefore particularly mentioned, to show that the most terrible people should not be able to stand before Joshua; but he should either destroy them, or expel them, and make them flee their country as these Hittites did; of whom we read, and of their kings, 2 Kings vii. 6.

Unto the great sea] The Mediterranean, which was the western border, as it here follows.

Toward the going down of the sun.] See upon Deut. xi. 24, and in other places.

Ver. 5. Be able to stand before thee.] As I was with Moses, so I will be with thee.] To subdue all the people of Canaan before him; as he did the Egyptians, the two kings of the Amorites, and the Midianites before Moses; to counsel also, and advise him in all difficulties, as he had done Moses.

I will not fail thee.] See upon Deut. xxxi. 6, 8. On which promise they relied in future times (1 Kings v. 57).
Joshua.

before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee. 6 Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I sware unto their fathers to give them. 7 Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest. 8 This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success.

Ver. 6. Be strong] This charge he had given him before the death of Moses (Deut. xxxi. 23), and David gave the same to Solomon (1 Chron. xxviii. 20). Unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land He had promised him, in the place before inhabited, that he "should bring them into the land," &c., and here now adds, that he should settle them in the possession of it, by assigning every one their portion in it; which he did by such a Divine direction as silenced all disputes about it. Ver. 7. Only be thou strong and very courageous] It requires the greatest courage and resolution, especially in a governor, to be truly pious and religious, by observing the laws himself, and seeing them observed by others. Turn not from it to the right hand or to the left.] By adding to it, or taking away from it (Deut. xii. ult.) or, more simply, no way deviate from it; for it is a metaphor from men in a journey, who go straight forward in the plain highway, and turn not aside into by-paths, which lead they know not whither. That thou mayest prosper Or do wisely, as it is in the margin; for it is the greatest policy to be truly religious. Ver. 8. This book of the law] The original of which was preserved in the sanctuary; from whence God now spake to him (Deut. xxxii. 26). Shall not depart out of thy mouth He was to read it continually, that he might instruct others and be thereby an example to all future governors and kings according to the law (Deut. xvii. 18, 19). By which it is evident, that Joshua had a copy of the law; which was then written and extant in his time. Thou shalt meditate therein] His other weighty employments were not to hinder him from pondering as well as reading, the law of God; because it was to be his rule in all his private transactions and public administrations. That thou mayest observe to do] Which was not possible without the serious and attentive consideration before mentioned. Thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and—have good success Or do wisely. Prudence and prosperity go together: but no prudence is comparable to the strict observance of the laws of God, upon which the felicity of kingdoms and states depends. Ver. 9] He confirms him in the resolution he had put into him (ver. 6), by two arguments, the Divine vocation, and the Divine presence with him (see Deut. i. 29, 30, xxxi. 6—8). The latter of which the Targum thus expresseth, "For the Word of the Lord thy God shall be for thy help, in every place where thou goest" (see ver. 11). Ver. 10. Joshua commanded the officers] I have often observed, that the shophethim were judges, who heard causes in their courts, and pronounced sentence; so shoterim were inferior officers belonging to the court, who summoned people to attend, and executed the sentence; for after Moses had mentioned (Deut. i. 15) the chief of their tribes, captains over thousands, and hundreds, and fifties, and tens, he at last mentions these officers among their helpers; who were employed, it appears by this place, in the camp, as well as in the courts of justice. Ver. 11. Command the people, saying, Prepare you victuals] They were to make proclamation not only in all the four camps of Israel, but in the several tribes who were under those standards, to provide themselves with such victuals as the country of Sihon and Og, which they had lately conquered, afforded. For being, after three days (iii. 1), to remove very early in the morning, perhaps they might not have had time to gather manna sufficient, and to prepare it before they began their march. For within three days See iii. 1, 2. Ye shall pass over this Jordan] Which was not so far from Shittim, where they now lay, but they could see it. Which the Lord your God giveth you to possess it] He constantly remembers them of this donation from God; both to strengthen their faith, and to excite their thankfulness. "For they got not the land in possession by their own sword, neither did their arm save them; but his right hand, &c., because he had a favour to them as the Psalmist speaks, xlv. 3. Ver. 12] Here he begins to do according to the command of Moses, as God before directed him, ver. 7, 8. For Moses had given this charge to the Reubenites, &c., when he gave them their possession on this side Jordan, Numb. xxxii. 20, 21, &c., and put them in mind of it again, Deut. iii. 18, &c. Ver. 13. Joshua commanded the officers Moses—commanded you] It is very observable, how gently and not imperiously Joshua exercises his authority, at his first entrance upon his office. For he only puts them in mind of what Moses required from them, and leaves them to reflect upon the promise they made to him. The Lord your God hath given you—this land] That is, actually bestowed upon them a country to settle in.
CHAPTER II.

cattle, shall remain in the land which Moses gave you on this side Jordan; but ye shall pass before your brethren armed, all the mighty men of valour, and help them:

15 Until the Lord have given your brethren rest, as he hath given you, and they also have possessed the land which the Lord your God giveth them: then ye shall return unto the land of your possession, and enjoy it, which Moses the Lord's servant gave you on this side Jordan, toward the sunrise.

16 ¶ And they answered Joshua, saying,

For here their wives, and children, and cattle remained (with a sufficient number of persons to look after them), when they marched into Canaan, as it follows in the next verse.

March in the front of them, to show their forwardness to bring them into the same happy condition with themselves.

All the mighty men of valour, and help them. Such as Joshua picked out; for it is evident they did not all go over, but only forty thousand of them (iv. 13).

The rest, though fit for war, were left to defend their wives, children, and flocks, while those mighty men of valour went to help their brethren.

Ver. 15. Until the Lord have given your brethren rest.
A settled possession of the land of Canaan, as they had of the land of the two kingdoms of the Amorites.

They also have possessed the land. He would have them look upon the conquest of the land as certain, because God had made a grant of it to their brethren.

Which Moses—gave you on this side Jordan. According to the agreement which Moses had made with them (Numb. xxxiii. 20—22).

Ver. 16. It is likely, this was the answer not only of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, but of all the rest of the tribes; before whom Joshua puts these two tribes and a half in mind of their duty: which they all engage to perform exactly; these words containing a full recognition of Joshua's authority, and their absolute submission to it.

Ver. 17. According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee. Here they acknowledge his authority to be equal to that of Moses, as all that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us, we will go.

17 According as we hearkened unto Moses in all things, so will we hearken unto thee: only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses.

18 Whosoever he be that doth rebel against thy commandment, and will not hearken unto thy words in all that thou commandest him, he shall be put to death: only be strong and of a good courage.

who was undoubtedly set over them by God, as they now own Joshua to be.

Only the Lord thy God be with thee, as he was with Moses. These words are not a restriction of their obedience, which did not depend upon his successes, but a solemn prayer to God, of whom they desired no other governor than him, that he would make him victorious as Moses was over all their enemies.

Therefore, some translate the words, not only, but "may the Lord thy God," &c., or, "Since the Lord thy God hath promised to be with thee." The Targum paraphrases these words as he did ver. 9, "Only let the Word of the Lord thy God be thy helper, as he was to Moses."

Ver. 18. Whosoever he be that doth rebel—shall be put to death. This seems to be the voice of all the people, and of their elders, or a decree made by the elders, as the Jews understand it: who, looking upon Joshua to be a king, as Moses was, extend this to all the kings of Israel in following times. So Guilielmi Schickard observes out of Maimonides in his Miscellanea, cap. 4, theor. 14. p. 101. But it should rather be said, that Joshua was a king and a prophet as Moses was; and the law, as Rashi observes, ordered him to be put to death that transgressed the orders of Moses, and of a prophet.

Only be strong! He had the greater reason to be courageous, since they resolved as one man, to stand by him, and never to Joshua; that he would make him the word Tekal, which we translate only, should rather be translated therefore, as it plainly signifies, xiii. 6, where, speaking of the land that remained to be possessed, God promises to drive out the inhabitants, and therefore bids Joshua to divide it to the Israelites for an inheritance.

CHAPTER II.

1 Rahab receiveth and concealeth the two spies sent from Shittim. 8 The covenant between her and them.

23 Their return and relation.

And Joshua the son of Nun sent out of Shittim two men to spy secretly, saying, Go view the land, even Jericho. And they went, and came into an harlot's house, named Rahab, and lodged there.

And it was told the king of Jericho, saying,

To spy secretly. So that none were privy to it among the Israelites but Joshua; who, it is probable, did not send them without an order from God, who intended to dispose things so, that they should bring back to him a great encouragement to his faith.

Saying, Go view the land. Not the whole country of Canaan, but only that part of it which lay about Jericho, as it here follows: whose fortifications they were to observe, and the approaches to it, with the strength that was in it.

They went. Over the fords of Jordan, I suppose, mentioned ver. 7.
Behold, there came men in hitherto to night of the children of Israel to search out the country.

3 And the king of Jericho sent unto Rahab, saying, Bring forth the men that are come to thee, which are entered into thine house; for they be come to search out all the country.

4 And the woman took the two men, and hid them, and said thus, There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were;

5 And it came to pass about the time of shutting of the gate, when it was dark, that the men went out: whether the men went I wot not: pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them.

 Came into an harlot's house, named Rahab.] Who kept a public house, or an inn, to entertain strangers; by going into which, they thought they would be less suspected of any design. This word ἀραβέα, which is commonly translated a harlot, the Chaldean paraphrase renders pandakitha; which is plainly the Greek word πανδακήθη, signifying she kept a house of public reception. And so St. Chrysostom calls this woman, in his second sermon of repentance, πανδακήθη ἀραβέα; for there is no doubt she kept a public house. But such persons, in those days, made their houses as public as their houses; and, therefore, she is constantly called Rahab the harlot by the ancients; and even by two apostles, who call her πανδακήθη (Heb. xi. 21; James ii. 25). For so she had been, though now it is probable, converted by the faith which was wrought in her. Which was so eminent, that she was not only admitted into the society of God's people, but married into a family of the tribe of Judah, by which she became a inhabitant of the land, from which Christ sprung (Matt. i. 5), and is propounded as an example of lively faith unto all Christians (Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25).

 Lodged there.] Took up their lodging in her house, by a divine direction, as appeared afterward.

 Ver. 2. It was told the king of Jericho.] Who was not at all vigilant to have a watch to observe who came in and went out of the city.

 Behold, there came men in hitherto to night!] In the evening, which was the most proper time to come into the city undiscovered, because then the people, whose business lay out of the city, were generally going home to their own houses.

 Of the children of Israel!] As they judged by their habit, or language, or aspect.

 To search.] For they could not think they came for any other end.

 Ver. 3.] He sent some officers with a warrant to apprehend them, and to require her to deliver them up into their hands, as enemies of their country.

 Ver. 4. The woman took the two men, and hid them.] Or, as she thought; let the officers come; having heard, it is likely, a rumour that they were discovered, and search would be made for them. There came men unto me, but I wist not whence they were.] She could not deny that she received such strange guests; but would not own that she knew from what country they came: nor was it her business to make such inquiry, her house being open unto all.

 Ver. 5. About the time of shutting of the gate.] The gate of the city next to her house, which was wont to be shut (as they are now in all well-governed cities) at a certain hour.

 When it was dark, And consequently few or none stirring in the street.

 Whither the men went I wot not. She would have them think they went both out of the house and out of the city; though she knew not which way they went, it being dark.

 Pursue after them quickly; for ye shall overtake them.] Yet it was so little a while since they went out, that she would have them believe they could not, if they made haste, but overtake them before they got over Jordan. For if they were Israelites, it might be certainly concluded they went that way. Nobody can say that Rahab did not tell an untruth; but this may be said in her excuse: that it is no wonder if she thought it lawful, if not necessary, so to do, for the saving of the life of innocent men. Since several great philosophers have been of that opinion, and some of the ancient fathers of the church; particularly St. Austin confesses it to be a very difficult question, cap. xv. ad Consentium: and Aurius Montanus upon this very place, makes it one's duty to elude those who we think intend to do mischief to others; and some pronounce, that such as Rahab, who was about to save a father and mother, and all their kindred, from the hands of their pursuers, in a discourse concerning Men's true and certain Duties. But that is too bold an undertaking, since the fathers before St. Austin, and all the Jews condemn this practice.

 Ver. 6. She had brought them up to the roof of the house.] Which was made flat, so that men might lie down upon it in those countries (see Deut. xxiii. 8).

 Hid them with the stalks of flax.] Covered them all over with the stalks of flax, which I suppose were newly cut, and laid upon the roof of the house to be dried by the sun, till they were fit to be peeled. Or, as some think, these were stalks of flax cut the year before; and made use of now to show that nobody was gone upon the roof, where she laid them.

 Ver. 7. The men pursued after them the way to Jordan unto the fords.] Where Jordan was so shallow that men might wade, or so narrow that they might soon swim over it. There the pursuers lay three days, waiting to catch them in their return.

 As soon as they—were gone out, they shut the gate.] Which, being opened to let the pursuers out, was immediately shut again; that if the spies lurked in the city, they might not escape in the dark; and that no other person might enter, who they might possibly think lay watching an opportunity to get in.

 Ver. 8. Before they were laid down.] To compose themselves to sleep; which after their journey they might be glad to take anywhere.

 She came up unto them.] To bring them down, it is likely, to a more commodious lodging.

 Ver. 9. I know that the Lord hath given you the land.] Wonder not that I have taken such care of your preservation; for I believe in the Lord as you do, and know that he hath bestowed this country upon you for your possession.

 And that your terror is fallen upon us.] She was up the water of the Red sea for you, when ye came out of Egypt; and what ye did unto the two kings of the Amorites, that were on the other side Jordan, Sihon and Og, whom ye utterly destroyed.

11 And as soon as we had heard these things, our hearts did melt, neither did there remain any more courage in any man, because of you: for the Lord your God, he is God in heaven above, and in earth beneath.

12 Now therefore, I pray you, swear unto me by the Lord, since I have shewed you kindness, that ye will also shew kindness unto my father’s house, and give me a true token:

13 And that ye will save alive my father, and my mother, and my brethren, and my sisters, and all that they have, and deliver our lives from death.

14 And the men answered her, Our life for your’s, if ye utter not this our business. And it shall be, when the Lord hath given us the land, that we will deal kindly and truly with thee.

15 Then she let them down by a cord through the window: for her house was upon the town wall, and she dwelt upon the wall.

16 And she said unto them, Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you; and hide yourselves there three days, until the pursuers be returned: and afterward may ye go your way.

17 And the men said unto her, We will be

All that they have, &c.] All her kindred, as we translate it, vi. 23. Or the children of her brethren and sisters: or, perhaps, all their cattle, that they could bring with them into her house.

Ver. 14. Our life for your’s.] They swor to her (it appears from ver. 17) and wished they might per- rish, if they did not preserve her and her family. For they did not doubt but Joshua would ratify what they promised, though without his authority, for the public good and safety. If ye utter not] Do not divulge or declare to any one.

This our business.] In the Hebrew, this our word, i.e. this agreement they had made with her. Lest others should shelter themselves under her roof, or use that token they intended to give her; and thereby secure themselves from destruction. In this they showed great prudence and management; taking care that their gratitude might not prove an obstruction to the public justice.

We will deal kindly and truly with thee.] Upon this condition they promise, when they had taken Jericho (for that is here meant by the land, ver. 1), they would keep their word faithfully with her, and be as kind to her as she had been to them.

Ver. 15. She let them down—through the window.] Which in those countries were large, as appears by the story of Jezebel, whom her eunuchs threw down out of a window, 2 Kings ix. 30, 33.

Her house was upon the town wall.] Both the time (which was in the night) and the place were very commodious to contrive their escape; because her house was adjoining to the wall of the city.

She dwelt upon the wall.] I take the meaning to be, that the apartment she reserved for herself was next to the wall, and built upon it; the rest of her house towards the street being kept for strangers. This gave her the fair opportunity, without any noise, to let them down.

Ver. 16. Get you to the mountain, lest the pursuers meet you.] This was prudent advice, not to go towards Jordan presently, but first to one of the mountains, wherewith the plain of Jericho was surrounded, as Josephus tells us (lib. i. De Bello Judaico, cap. 12, 13, and lib. v. cap. 4); and the Scripture itself informs us as much, 2 Kings ii. 15, 16.

Hide yourselves there.] In some of the coves, which were frequent in the mountains.

Three days.} For so long a time the pursuers might stay about Jordan, waiting for their return.

[until the pursuers be returned.] Which she thought probably would be within that time; and perhaps she understood their orders were to stay no longer.

Ver. 17. The men said unto her.] As she was about to let them down; for it was not safe to have this JOSHUA.

21 And she said, According unto your words, so be it. And she sent them away, and they departed: and she bound the scarlet line in the window.

22 And they went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days, until the pursuers were returned: and the pursuers sought them throughout all the way, but found them not.

23 ¶ So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain, and passed over, and came to Joshua the son of Nun, and told him all things that befell them:

24 And they said unto Joshua, Truly the Lord hath delivered into our hands all the land; for even all the inhabitants of the country do faint because of us.

discourse together after they were down; which might have been overheard by the watch.

We will be blameless of this thine oath which thou hast made us swear.] The meaning is, that it should not be their fault if their oath was not kept; and therefore they now name the token, upon which the preservation of her family should depend; with some other conditions that were reasonable to be observed. Which they mention, to show how studious they were not to be guilty of violating their oath.

Ver. 18. Bind this line of scarlet thread] It is called a cord before, ver. 15, and no doubt consisted of so many threads twisted together, as made it a line strong enough to hold the weight of a man’s body, and not break. But there are those who doubt whether the Hebrew word sheni signify any thing of the colour, but only a twisted or twisted cord, funiculum conduplicatum, or contortum; from shanah to double (see Gataker in his Miscellanea, cap. 40).

In the window which thou didst let us down by.] Or rather, "dost let us down by." For she was about to do it, but had not done it, when they had this discourse with her. Some refer this to the window at which she let them out; but it is most natural to refer it to the line. For by that they were let down, and it was to remain in the window, that the Israelites might see it, as the token that was the house which was to be saved. Procopius Gazaem compares this scarlet line with the blood which Moses ordered to be struck upon the side posts of their doors, which was a token they should be preserved (Exod. xii. 7, 13).

Bring thy father, &c., home unto thee.] That is, all their children; and perhaps near relations, such as uncles, aunts, and cousins; as we seem to understand it, vi. 23. And one cannot but think, that great-grandfathers and grandmothers, if she had any alive, were comprehended in these words.

Ver. 19. Whosoever shall go out of the doors—his blood shall be upon his head.] They would be bound to preserve none but those who kept in the house. Which was but reasonable, for they did not know how to distinguish them from others, if they were in the street.

Whosoever shall be with thee in the house, his blood shall be on our head, if any hand be upon him.] They would as soon die themselves, as let any of these perish. An emblem of our safety and salvation, by continuing constantly in the church in faith and holiness. For her house was a very fit figure of the church, especially of the gentiles; who, like her, had gone a whoring after idols, but were converted to serve the living God.

Ver. 20.] They repeat the condition mentioned ver. 14, as of great importance (see there).

Ver. 21. According unto your words, so be it.] She agreed to all the conditions they imposed upon her.

She sent them away.] After this mutual agreement, confirmed with an oath.

She bound the scarlet line in the window.] Immediately, as some think; that the spies might know where to look for it hereafter, and that she might have always before her eyes such a comfortable pledge of her safety. It was more prudent also, as Arius Montanus observes, to do it now, than when the Israelites came to besiege the place; for that novelty might have made the people of Jericho suspect some correspondence.

Ver. 22. They went, and came unto the mountain, and abode there three days.] Being furnished, it is likely, with sufficient provision by Rahab. Many think they stayed there but one whole day, and part of other two, which, according to the style of the Scripture, may be called three days: but their only reason for it is to make these three days, and those mentioned in the first chapter, ver. 11, to be the same, which is not probable.

The pursuers sought them throughout all the way, &c.] Which led to the fords of Jordan. This expresses their diligence, though it wanted success; and, perhaps, there were more ways than one that led thither; in all which they placed themselves, or some other persons, to watch for them.

Ver. 23. So the two men returned, and descended from the mountain.] From whence, perhaps, they could see when the pursuers came back; or they had some intelligence of their return; or, as I said before, that they had commission only to search for them three days.

And passed over.] The river Jordan.

And came to Joshua—and told him all things that befell them.] Since they left him. This shows that Joshua sent them so privately, that it was unknown to the people (as I expounded, ver. 1), for they gave him alone an account of what had happened unto them (see vi. 17).

Ver. 24.] This was part of what they had learned from Rahab (ver. 9, &c.), who had strengthened their faith by her own.
CHAPTER III.

1 Joshua cometh to Jordan. 2 The officers instruct the people for the passage. 7 The Lord encourages Joshua. 9 Joshua encourageth the people. 14 The waters of Jordan are divided.

I And Joshua rose early in the morning; and they removed from Shittim, and came to Jordan, he and all the children of Israel, and lodged there before they passed over.

2 And it came to pass after three days, that the officers went through the host;

3 And they commanded the people, saying, When ye see the ark of the covenant of the Lord your God, and the priests the Levites bearing it, then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it.

CHAP. III.

Ver. 1. Joshua rose early in the morning: The next morning after he had commanded the officers to warn the host to prepare for their removal (ch. 1. 10, 11).

They removed from Shittim. Where they had lain now above two months; for they came hither on the first day of the eleventh month of the fourth year after they came out of Egypt (see Deut. i. 3).

Came to Jordan, Which river, as Josephus tells us, was sixty stadia from Shittim; but it is so uncertain what it translates, that one can only guess how many of our miles threescore of them made. Most think about seven.

Lodged there. The Hebrew word zalim doth not necessarily signify that they lodged there only one night, for it often denotes a longer time of abode; and therefore the Vulgar Latin translates it moruit sunt, "they stayed there!" viz., three days, as it follows in the next verse.

Ver. 2. In the end of the three days before mentioned (ch. 1. 10, 11), he sent the same officers there mentioned to make a new proclamation; for it seems to me most reasonable to take all this story in the order wherein it is related, only supposing the spies to have been sent before the first proclamation made by the officers (as above), for the words may be translated. And thus our great primate of Ireland understands it. After Joshua was confirmed in his office (ch. i. ver. 1, 2, &c.), he sent out the spies, and then commanding the people to provide themselves victuals, he marched from Shittim to Jordan; and the third day (after that command to provide themselves victuals) he gave a new command to prepare themselves to pass over Jordan the next day.

Ver. 3. They commanded the people. By order from Joshua, and in his name and authority.

Saying, When ye see the ark—and the priests the Levites bearing it. "Hitherto (saith Kimchi upon this place) the Levites (that is, the children of Kohath) carried the ark; but now the priests are appointed to that office, for the greater sanctification or honour of it, and because of the miracle which was to be wrought before it. Our rabbins say that the priests carried it thus three times; now in this place, and when they compassed Jericho, and when Zadok and Abiathar brought it back to Jerusalem, when David fled from Absalom" (2 Sam. xvi. 29). Unto which he adds a fourth, when it was brought into the temple which Solomon built; for the Levites were not permitted to go into the sanctuary, much less into the most holy place, into which it was carried by the priests (1 Kings viii. 6).

4 Yet there shall be a space between you and it, and about two thousand cubits by measure: come not near unto it, that ye may know the way by which ye must go: for ye have not passed this way heretofore.

5 And Joshua said unto the people, Sanctify yourselves: for to morrow the Lord will do wonders among you.

6 And Joshua spake unto the priests, saying, Take up the ark of the covenant, and pass over before the people. And they took up

Then ye shall remove from your place, and go after it. By this it appears the ark was carried in the front of them; whereas usually it was ordered to be carried in the middle of their camps, as we read Numb. ii. 17. But at their first removal from Mount Sinai, which was a time extraordinary, it marched before them for three days (Numb. x. 33), and so it did now (and at no other time), when they were to enter into Canaan, for a special reason also, as I shall observe on the next verse. Concerning the phrase "the priests the Levites," see Deut. xvii. 9.

Ver. 4. Yet there shall be a space between you and it, about two thousand cubits. This is a demonstration that it was not usual for the ark to go before the whole army; for if it had, there would have been no need to instruct them at what distance they should keep from it, which would have been constantly observed.

By measure. It is likely they measured the distance by a line, at which the people were first set; and then walking in equal paces with the priests, kept at the same distance, though perhaps not precisely; for they might chance to move a pace or two faster, or take larger paces; and therefore he saith about two thousand cubits.

That ye may know the way by which ye must go. There was the very same reason for the ark's going before the people as when they came from Mount Sinai; for then it was "to search out a resting-place for them," i.e. to show them where they should rest: and now it was to lead them in the way they were to march, unto their long-expected settlement in the promised land. If it had not been for this, it would have been carried in its usual place; but the pillar of the cloud, which hitherto conducted them, having now left them, as R. Solomon observes, this supplied its place, and went before them, as that had been wont to do.

Ye have not passed this way heretofore. They were to be led in an untrodden path, which the power of God (of whose presence with them the ark was the symbol) made for them.

Ver. 5. Joshua said unto the people. The night before they went over Jordan, as appears by the latter part of the verse; and perhaps he spake this himself, at the head of every one of their tribes, it being of great importance.

Sanctify yourselves. Other places tell us what was their usual sanctification (see Exod. xix. 10, 11; Numb. xi. 19). But besides the legal purifications, one cannot but think that he intended they should dispose their minds by holy meditations and prayer to God to receive his benefits, and to be more sensible of them when they were bestowed on them.
JOSHUA.

the ark of the covenant, and went before the people.

7 ¶ And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel, that they may know that, as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee.

8 And thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark of the covenant, saying, When ye are come to the brink of the river of Jordan, ye shall stand still in Jordan.

9 ¶ And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, Come hither, and hear the words of the Lord your God.

To morrow the Lord will do wonders.] Which he would have them be in a condition to observe and to lay to heart; and in order thereunto, prepare themselves by serious thoughts of God and of his providence, as well as by washing their bodies, and abstaining from their wives, which were a part of the sanctification here intended.

Take up the ark] Upon their shoulders, for so it was to be carried (Numb. vii. 9).

Pass over before the people.] This precept had been unanswered, as if they had been wont to carry it before the people.

They took up the ark] After Joshua had spoken what follows, ver. 7, 8, &c. But it is mentioned now to show the readiness of the priests, as well as of the people, to obey the commands of Joshua; whom they looked upon as a prophet, as Moses was, who had been wont to carry the ark of God.

Such were those for the priests to carry the ark, and to march with it before the people, not in the midst of their camps.

Ver. 7. The Lord said unto Joshua.] By an audible voice, I suppose, from the sanctuary, near unto which he now was; the priests being about to take out the ark from thence, to carry it before the people.

This day] The tenth day of the first month, on which the paschal lamb was by the law to be set apart, to be offered four days after (Exod. xii. 3).

Will I begin to magnify thee in the sight of all Israel.] By doing such wonders before them all, as should convince them Joshua was appointed by God to be their supreme governor, who should give them possession of the land of Canaan, as Moses had done (see iv. 14).

Is it with Moses so I will be with thee.] See i. 5. From the time of Moses to the days of Saul, God declared by some extraordinary things whom he would have to be the supreme governor of his people, whose authority he established by doing wonders.

Ver. 8. Thou shalt command the priests that bear the ark] Every thing was done by his order, that it might appear he was as much as God, who wrought those wonders at his word.

When ye are come to the brink—of Jordan:] Jordan then overflowed beyond its banks; therefore they were not to go to the brink of the river, but of the water.

Ye shall stand still] And there stop till the waters were suspended, and those below run away; and then they went and stood in the midst of the river (ver. 17).

Ver. 9. Come hither:] To the sanctuary, I suppose, where he now was (ver. 7).

Hear the words of the Lord.] Which Joshua reported to them from God, who was about to demonstrate himself to be the omnipotent Lord of all creatures, and in a peculiar manner their God, in covenant with them, and full of kindness to them.

10 And Joshua said, Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you, and that he will without fail drive out from before you the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Hivites, and the Perizzites, and the Girgashites, and the Amorites, and the Jebusites.

11 Behold, the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you into Jordan.

12 Now therefore take ye twelve men out of the tribes of Israel, out of every tribe a man.

13 And it shall come to pass, as soon as the soles of the feet of the priests that bear the ark

Ver. 10. Hereby ye shall know that the living God is among you.] These are the words of the Lord their God, who is called the living God, in opposition to the idols of the heathen; who could do nothing, much less such miracles as demonstrated the God of Israel to be the eternal Lord of heaven and earth, who giveth life to all things; and he is said to be among them (or in the midst of them) whom he takes into his protection, to defend and preserve them from all evil.

He will without fail drive out from before you.] Most certainly make good his promise made to Abraham long ago (Gen. xiv. 18, &c.), because he lives for ever to perform his word.

The Canaanites, &c.] Here all the seven nations are mentioned (as they are Deut. vii. 1), though sometimes only six of them are mentioned, the Girgashites being omitted (see Exod. xiii. 17).

Ver. 11. The ark of the covenant.] So called, because in it were put the tablets containing the covenant, and of God and them. It is frequently called "the ark of the covenant." (Exod. xl. 20, 31; Numb. iv. 5, and here in this book, iv. 16).

Of the Lord of all the earth passeth over before you.] To take possession of the land of Canaan, which he gave them as Lord of the whole earth, and as particularly engaged by his covenant to bestow upon them.

The author of the book Coseri understands this as if the ark of the covenant was called "the Lord of the whole earth;" because God was so present with it, that where the ark was there were wonders wrought, which ceased in its absence (par. iv. sect. 3). D. Kimchi and Jos. Albo say the same; and I find Andreas Masius following this fancy; because there is no additional meaning here. "The ark of God" is a name distinguishing those words from what follows, which (say they) are therefore added by apposition. But Bonfriéus hath confuted this very judiciously, observing, that the accent is not of that nature; and therefore the LXX., the Chaldee, the Vulgar Latin, Symmachus, Aquila, the Syriac, and Arabic, translate it as we do, "the ark of the covenant of the Lord of the whole earth." And yet, I know not how it came to pass, some have been so bold as to alter our translation in some printed copies which I have met withal, where these words are thus translated, "the ark of the covenant, even the Lord of the whole earth." Into Jordan:] By which miracle they were confirmed in their belief of his power, when they saw the waters of Jordan flee before him.

Ver. 12. Take you twelve men:] To do what he should command them (iv. 2, &c.).

Out of every tribe a man.] The tribe of Levi was one of the twelve, upon all accounts but only in the dividing of the land; Ephraim and Manasseh being but one, viz., the tribe of Joseph.

Ver. 13. The ark of the Lord:] Here the ark of the covenant is called the ark of Jehovah (not Jehovah), of the Lord, the Lord of all the earth, shall rest in the waters of Jordan, that the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the waters that were above from above; and they shall stand upon an heap.

14 And it came to pass, when the people removed from their tents, to pass over Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the people;

15 And as they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bare the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest,) who is the Lord, or governor and ruler of the whole earth: in which is comprehended the sea, and the rivers, and all waters, which he commandeth as he pleaseth.

Shall rest in the waters] Dip their feet in the brim of the waters, as it is explained ver. 15.

That the waters of Jordan shall be cut off from the water that was above from above. ] The waters which now ran in one stream were divided over against the place where the priests trod; so that the lower part of them ran down the channel towards the Dead Sea; and those above not coming down to supply their place, the ground was left dry.

They shall stand] Upon an heap. ] viz. The waters above towards the head or springs of the river, were made to stand still, as if they were concealed; rising in a heap, piled one upon another, but not running down at all.

Ver. 14. ] The priests moved first, and then the people followed them, at such a distance as Joshua prescribed (ver. 3, 4).

Ver. 15. ] As they that bare the ark were come unto Jordan. ] Which had overflowed, as it here follows, beyond the bounds of the channel.

For Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest. ] This is meant of barley-harvest, which began about the passover, as many have observed, and particularly Hermannus Conringius, in his book De Initio annt Sabbatii (see upon Deut. xvi. 9). And it appears by the next chapter (iv. 19) that it was in the first month, or the month Abib, when the passover was to be kept; and therefore must signify that harvest; see also 1 Chron. xii. 15.

This was likewise a time when the river was more likely to overflow than in wheat-harvest; because now the snow began to melt that was in the neighbouring mountains, especially in Lebanon; at the foot of which was the fountain of Jordan. By which the river was always swollen at this time, and thereby the miracle increased. Such overflows of other rivers, greater than this, are observed by authors at certain seasons, with which I shall not trouble the reader.

Ver. 16. ] The waters which came down from above stood. ] Stopped, and ran no farther; but were driven back unto those that were coming down.

Rose up upon an heap. ] Instead of flowing down the channel, were lifted up in the air; and appeared like a mountain, as the Vulgar Latin translates it.

Very far from the city Adam. ] At a great distance from a city then called Adam, which lay upon the river.

That is beside Zaretan. ] The former was a small city, and therefore its situation is described by a place of greater note called Zaretan, which lay on one side of it, in the plain of Jordan, as we read 1 Kings vii. 46.

Those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed. ] Those waters of the river, which were below, towards the salt sea, into which Jordan emptied itself, ran all thinner, and so left the channel perfectly dry, that the people might pass over, which they did, directly over against Jericho.

The people passed over right against Jericho. ] Having that famous city in their view; from whence, perhaps, the people on the walls might, with amazement, see the Israelites walk through the river on dry ground.

It was a great refreshment also to the Israelites after their march, to pitch their tents in so goodly a plain as this before Jericho.

Ver. 17. ] The priests stood firm on dry ground. ] In one and the same place and posture with their faces towards Jericho.

All the Israelites passed over. ] Keeping, I suppose, the same distance, of two thousand cubits from the ark; for there was room enough on either side to march by it, and not come near it.

Until all the people were passed clean over. ] Which they could not do in a short time, unless we suppose them to have marched all in abreast, which is not likely. For there was a certain place called, ever after by the name thereof, which is mentioned in the book of Job i. 25. It made, therefore, the faith and constancy of the priests very remarkable, who remained so long in the middle of the river, till the whole multitude were got over, without fear of that great mountain of waters from above coming tumbling down upon them.

They who look upon this part of the Divine history as improbable, if not incredible, should consider, what a shame it is to have less faith than the heathens: who lest their gods should be thought less powerful than the God of Israel, forged those stories which the Persians tell of Zoroaster's passing over rivers; and the Greeks of Inachus dried up by Neptune: and other suchlike; which Huetius hath collected in his Quaestiones Almatedae, lib. ii. cap. 12. n. 15. Why then do they call in question the power of the true God; who, either by himself, or his angels, could easily stop the course of a river which he himself made: and both make the waters rise up in a heap, as high as he pleased; and also stand so reared up in a firm hardness, as if they had been concealed?
CHAPTER IV.

1 Twelve men are appointed to take twelve stones for a memorial out of Jordan. 9 Twelve other stones are set up in the midst of Jordan. 10, 19 The people pass over. 14 God magnifieth Joshua. 20 The twelve stones are pitched in Gilgal.

1 And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over Jordan, that the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying,

2 Take you twelve men out of the people, out of every tribe a man,

3 And command ye them, saying, Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan, out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones, and ye shall carry them over with you, and leave them in the lodging place, where ye shall lodge this night.

4 Then Joshua called the twelve men, whom he had prepared of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man:

5 And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan, and take you up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel:

6 That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones?

7 Then ye shall answer them, That the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel for ever.

8 And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, as the Lord spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there.

9 And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood: and they are there unto this day.

10 ¶ For the priests which bare the ark stood

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 1. The Lord spake unto Joshua.] It is likely he went to return thanks unto God for so wonderful a mercy: and then God spake to him what follows.

Ver. 2.] He bids him now call together the twelve men formerly chosen, iii. 12.

Ver. 3. Command ye them.] I suppose Joshua had some of the elders, or heads of the tribes, that joined with him in this office.

Take you hence out of the midst of Jordan.] Which continued perfectly dry for some space after they were all gone over; that is, till the priests removed from thence.

Out of the place where the priests' feet stood firm, twelve stones.] Some understand this so precisely, as if they were to take them from under the very soles of the priests' feet, which is not probable; but only near to the place where they stood. For the priests did not stir a step from the place where they first stood, and therefore none can tell how they should take these stones from under their feet, and place others in their room (ver. 9), while they remained standing fixed in the same place.

Ye shall carry them over with you.] In the sight of all the people, to make the miracle more known among them all.

Leave them—where ye shall lodge this night.] As a monument of this miraculous work of God; which remained ever after in Gilgal; the place where they lodged that night, ver. 19, 20.

Ver. 4.] Before they passed over Jordan (iii. 19).

Ver. 5. Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan.] This is a Divine order to go back again into the river, to the very place where the priests stood again into the ark; by which these twelve men were dispensèd withal, to come nearer to the ark than the rest of the congregation.

Take you up every man—a stone upon his shoulder.] Great stones, as big as they could well lift and carry.

So the Hebrew word imports, ver. 5.

According unto the number of the tribes.] That they might publish in every tribe this evident testimony of the power of God; which laid the bottom of the river dry for so long a time, that they not only all went over on dry ground, but some of them returned again and took up these stones, and laid others in their room (ver. 9).

Ver. 6. That this may be a sign among you.] A token of what God had now done for them.

That when your children ask—What mean ye by these stones?] It was natural for men, in future ages, seeing great stones (in a place, perhaps, where there were no more), and just twelve of them, laid together or one upon another, to ask how they came there, and for what end they were brought thither, and by whom.

Ver. 7. Then ye shall answer them, &c.] This was to give them occasion to report, at large, what God had done for them at their entrance into Canaan; that their posterity might be affected with it, no less than themselves.

These stones shall be for a memorial.] To keep in memory this miracle in all ages to come, as long as this nation lasted. All people have been wont to erect monuments of stone to preserve the memory of covenants or victories, or other great things. And though there was no inscription upon these stones, yet the number of them, and the place where they lay, which was noted down, was sufficient to signify some memorable thing; which, upon inquiry, would be made known to those that saw and observed them.

Ver. 8. The children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded.] That is, the twelve men did according to his order, both in taking up the stones and carrying them to the place where they lodged.

Laid them down there.] Which, perhaps, were erected into a kind of pillar, that they might look like a monument of something done thereabout. Or, they were so placed, as to be so many little monuments of God's mercy (see ver. 20).

Ver. 9. Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan.] This renders it probable, that the other twelve stones taken out of Jordan were set up in Gilgal, as these, taken out of some of the fields therein the midst of Jordan, until every thing was finished that the Lord commanded Joshua to speak unto the people, according to all that Moses commanded Joshua: and the people hasted and passed over.
CHAPTER IV.

11 And it came to pass, when all the people were clean passed over, that the ark of the Lord passed over, and the priests, in the presence of the people.
12 And the children of Reuben, and the children of Gad, and half the tribe of Manasseh, passed over armed before the children of Israel, as Moses spake unto them:
13 About forty thousand prepared for war passed over before the Lord unto battle, to the plains of Jericho.

about, were erected in the midst of the river, to testify to all posterity their miraculous passage over it at this place.

They are there unto this day.] From hence, not only such men as Mr. Hobbes, but Masius, and Grotonius, with many others, have argued, that this book was not written by Joshua, but by some person who lived at a great distance from his time, as these words, they fancy, import. But this is a mere fancy; for if Joshua wrote this book in his old age, or, at least, then added his last hand to it (as it is probable he did), he might as well use these words as one that lived a hundred years after. And, at this rate of arguing (as Huetius observes), Moses must not be the author of the book of Deuteronomy (where he speaks in the same style, x. 5, xi. 4), nor St. Matthew the author of the gospel, which he wrote not many years after our Saviour’s death; who uses the very same words, xxvii. 8, xxviii. 21 (see Demonstr. Evang. præp., iv. cap. 24).

Ver. 10. For the priests which bare the ark stood in the midst of Jordan.] It is remarkable in this whole relation, that when the priests are mentioned, these words are still added, “that bare the ark,” or, “the ark of the covenant” (both in this chapter, ver. 9, 16, 18, and in the foregoing, ver. 13—15, 17), to show that this miracle was not to be ascribed to them, but to the power of the Lord.

Until every thing was finished that the Lord commanded.] Concerning the taking up of the twelve stones, and placing others in their room; and all that preceded concerning their passing over the river; which, it is likely, he exhorted them to do cheerfully.

According to all that Moses commanded Joshua:] We do not read that Moses gave any particular directions about the foregoing matters; therefore the meaning is, that Joshua strenuously executed all that God ordered, as Moses had admonished him, Deut. iii. 28, and other places.

The people hasted, and passed over.] This doth not refer to all the people, as if they went a swift pace over the river, out of fear of the waters overwhelming them (as some think), but to such as remained still behind the ark, to attend its motion. Who now seeing all that Joshua commanded was finished, made haste to get over the river, as their brethren had done before them. It is said, indeed (ver. 1), that when all the people were clean passed over, Joshua gave order about the twelve stones: but the meaning is, when the main body of the people were gone over; for it appears by the next verse, that they had not all entirely passed over until now.

Ver. 11. When all the people were clean passed over:] So that none were remaining in the plains of Moab, from whence they came.

14 ¶ On that day the Lord magnified Joshua in the sight of all Israel; and they feared him, as they feared Moses, all the days of his life.
15 And the Lord spake unto Joshua, saying, 16 Command the priests that bear the ark of the testimony, that they come up out of Jordan.
17 Joshua therefore commanded the priests, saying, Come ye up out of Jordan.
18 And it came to pass, when the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord were come up out of the midst of Jordan, and the soles of the priests’ feet were lifted up unto the dry land, that the waters of Jordan returned unto their place, and flowed over all his banks, as they did before.

19 ¶ And the people came up out of Jordan

That the ark of the Lord passed over, and the priests,] They who went first into the river came last out: it being by the power of the Lord, whose ark the priests bare, that the course of the river was stopped, and a way made for all the people to pass over.

In the presence of the people.] Who beheld the water standing still on a heap, while the ark was in the river; but come tumbling down when it was gone. Which demonstrated that it was God’s presence with them, to which alone they owed this miraculous mercy.

Ver. 12.] They were the first that passed over (according to their engagement, Numb. xxvii. 20, 21, 27, of which Joshua had put them in mind, i. 13), ready to encounter any enemy that might have opposed their landing.

Ver. 13. About forty thousand prepared for war.] Or, ready armed (as it is in the margin), and prepared to fight, in case they met with any opposition. It is observable, that in the last muster, made not long ago, of those that were fit for war, in their several tribes, there were above forty thousand in the tribe of Reuben alone; and above fifty thousand in that of Manasseh (Numb. xxvi. 7, 34). And therefore it is likely, Joshua picked out only this number of chosen men; and left all the rest to look after their families and flocks.

Pased over before the Lord unto battle.] Being passed over the river, they stood in battle array before the ark; at the distance, I suppose, of two thousand cubits.

To the plains of Jericho.] Where it might be supposed the people of Jericho would have encamped, to hinder their passage.

Ver. 14. The Lord magnified Joshua:] As he promised, iii. 7.

They feared him:] This wonder gained him the like respect and reverence, that the dividing the Red Sea did to Moses (Exod. xiv. 31).

Ver. 15.] All this business was managed purely by the Divine direction.

Ver. 16.] The mind of which river, where they stood, being the lowest and deepest part of it, they are properly said to come up when they left that station.

Ver. 17.] Where they waited for the Divine order, and did not stir till they received it.

Ver. 18. The dry land.] Where the waters of Jordan, when it overflowed farthestmost, were never wont to come.

That the waters of Jordan returned.] The channel was filled again by the descent of the waters. Which for some time had stood heaped up, and could not stir; but now were let loose to keep their ancient course.

CHAPTER V.

Ver. 1. When all the kings of the Amorites, These were the principal inhabitants, and the most valiant in all the country; as hath been formerly noted.

Ver. 20. And those twelve stones, which they took out of Jordan, did Joshua pitch in Gilgal.

Ver. 21 And he spake unto the children of Israel, saying, When your children shall ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean these stones?

Ver. 22 Then ye shall let your children know, likely, by a gradual descent of the water, and not by the tumbling down of that great heap all at once.

Ver. 19. The people came up out of Jordan on the tenth day of the first month,] In which month they came out of Egypt, upon the fifteenth day of it; so that there wanted just five days of forty years since their coming from thence.

Encamped in Gilgal,] A place very famous in after-times, because of their first encampment here; where they seem to have continued for several years, during the wars of Canaan. Here also they were circumcised (from whence the place has its name, ver. 9), and kept the first passover; the tabernacle and the ark remaining here, as long as the Israelites kept their station in this place. See ix. 6, x. 6, 43, xiv. 6, which was, I suppose, till the war was ended; and they had also begun to divide the land (see xiv. 6). After which the tabernacle was fixed in Shiloh (xviii. 1, xxii. 9, 13); though still Gilgal continued a famous place, as appears from Judg. ii. 1; 1 Sam. xi. 14, 15, xiii. 4, &c.

In the east border of Jericho.] That is, between Jordan which lay behind them, and Jericho which lay before them.

Ver. 20. We are not told in what form they were pitched; whether they remained single and distinct, or, as Josephus will have it, joined together in the form of an altar. It seems to agree best with the end and intention of them, if we conceive them to have been set down single, but in some order (suppose three in a row), representing, like so many little pillars, the twelve tribes of Israel; who passing over Jordan on dry ground, a man out of each tribe was ordered to bring a stone, and place them here, for a perpetual memorial (ver. 7) of what God had done for them. For stones, every one knows (especially some sort of them), are of a very durable nature, and therefore used by all nations in the monuments they have made to preserve the memory of persons and things. Inasmuch, that if it be true which Procopius reports (in his second book De Bello Vandalico) concerning the two pillars erected by the Canaanites, who fled into Africa before the face of Joshua, with an inscription signifying their expiation by him; I conclude it to have been done in imitation of these stones, whereby Joshua preserved the memory of the miraculous way which was opened to him for their expulsion.

Ver. 21.] See ver. 6, where he had said this, at the time they took up the stones; and now repeats it, when they pitched them. For then he may be thought to have spoken only to the twelve men; but now to all the twelve tribes.

Ver. 22.] That it might not be left to every man's liberty to give what answer they pleased to their children, when they inquired the meaning of these stones, he sets down the very words they should speak unto them; that they might be sure to be duly instructed in the wonderful mercy of God to their nation.

Ver. 23. The Lord your God dried up the waters.] He would have posterity made sensible it was a Divine benefit bestowed on them by the Divine Power: which alone could stop the course of a river, till a whole nation passed over on dry ground.

As the Lord your God did to the Red sea.] At the same time he would have them take occasion to remember them of another miraculous mercy, like unto this, though superior to it. Which the prophets, in after times, delighted to commemorate together, as appears from Ps. cxiv. 5.

Which he dried up from before us.] What he did for their forefathers he did for them, who reaped the happy fruit of it; just as the saving of Noah and his family in the ark was the saving of all mankind, who sprang from them.

Ver. 24. That all the people—might know the hand of the Lord.] All nations round about, who heard of this, might be made sensible of the power of the God of Israel.

That it is mighty.] Which can do all things.

That ye might fear the Lord your God for ever.] The people of Israel especially (for whom these wonders were wrought), might religiously worship and serve him: for so the fear of God frequently signifies in Scripture; and therefore the LXX. here translate these words, ταυτα ευγαμοι διανοιαν τον θεον ειμοι, "that ye may worship the Lord your God;" which includes in it all the duty owing to him. And so they translate the last words for ever, εις παντι τη γη "in every thing that you do,'"

CHAPTER V.

1 The Canaanites are afraid. 2 Joshua reneweth circumcision. 10 The passover is kept at Gilgal. 12 Manna ceaseth. 13 An Angel appeareth to Joshua.

1 And it came to pass, when all the kings of the Amorites, which were on the side of Jordan westward, and all the kings of the Canaanites, which were by the sea, heard that the Lord had dried up the waters of Jordan from before the children of Israel, until we were passed over, that their heart melted, neither was there spirit in them any more, because of the children of Israel.

2 ¶ At that time the Lord said unto Joshua, Make thee sharp knives, and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time.

3 And Joshua made him sharp knives, and circumcised the children of Israel at the hill of the foreskins.

4 And this is the cause why Joshua did circumcise: All the people that came out of Egypt, that were males, even all the men of war, died in the wilderness by the way, after they came out of Egypt.

made of stones, such as Zipporah, it is supposed, used in the circumcision of her son (Exod. iv. 25). See this question debated in Sixtius Amama’s Anti-barbarus, lib. ii. p. 293. Justin Martyr thinks there was some mystery in the use of these knives (see his dialogue with Trypho, p. 341, 342).

Circumcision and Israel the second time.] This doth not signify that they who had been circumcised heretofore, were to be now circumcised again (from whence some have drawn an argument for the repeating of baptism, as St. Austin tells us), but that there had been such a general circumcision heretofore ordered, as there was to be now after a long omission of that rite. And it is probable that it was at Mount Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they came out of Egypt. When they kept a passover on the fourteenth day of that month (Num. ix. 1–3), and before they kept it, circumcised all that had not been circumcised in Egypt, or since they came out of it. For no uncircumcised person, nor any one who had a son, or a servant in his house uncircumcised, was capable to be admitted to it. We do not read, indeed, of the neglect of circumcision in Egypt, or in that year wherein they came out of it; but, considering the great oppression they lay under in that country, and the several distresses they were in after their deliverance, for three months, till they came to Sinait; and the absence of Pharaoh’s forces so long that the rite was not observable to the Egyptians, it is probable this rite was omitted till God called upon them (as he did now) to celebrate the passover; and then they were constrained to take care of it, because otherwise they could not have kept it, (see Selden, lib. ii. De Synedr. cap. 2, n. 1).

Ver. 3. Joshua made him sharp knives, and circumcised the children of Israel.] Ordered every one that came over to be circumcised; and, it is probable, not only all those that came over Jordan, but such of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, as were left on the other side, were circumcised also, and all in one day, that they might be in a condition to eat the passover: nor need it seem strange that it was despatched in such a short time, for they might employ as many hands as they pleased in this work, there being no necessity that a priest or a Levite should do it, but it might be performed by their fathers or mothers, or any other person.

At the hill of the foreskins.] In the Hebrew, at “Gibeath Naaraaboth;” which some take to be the name of the place where they were circumcised; but then that place was called from the foreskins which were so many, that being laid upon a heap and covered with earth, they made a little hillock, as the Jews conceive (see Pirke Eliezer, cap. 29).

Ver. 4. This is the cause. The reason of this order, and of the execution of it, is here given.

All the people that came out of Egypt, even all the men of war, died in the wilderness.] That is, all that were twenty years old, for such only were reputed men of war, and were guilty of the sedition mentioned in Num. xiv. for which they were doomed to perish in the wilderness.

Ver. 5. Now all the people that came out were circumcised.] Not only those who died for their rebel-5 Now all the people that came out were circumcised: but all the people that were born in the wilderness by the way as they came forth out of Egypt, them they had not circumcised.

6 For the children of Israel walked forty years in the wilderness, till all the people that were men of war, which came out of Egypt, were consumed; because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord: unto whom the Lord swore that he would not shew them the land, which the Lord sware unto their fathers that he would give us, a land that floweth with milk and honey.

7 And their children, whom he raised up in their stead, them Joshua circumcised: for they were uncircumcised, because they had not circumcised them by the way.

8 And it came to pass, when they had done circumcising all the people, that they abode in their places in the camp, till they were whole.

9 And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day thou shalt pass over Jordan into the land which the Lord sware unto Joshua, unto the children of Israel, for to possess it: and thou shalt do war.

jli0n, but all the rest under twenty years old were generally circumcised, except some infants, who (as I said upon ver. 2), might have been neglected during their heavy oppression there.

But all the people that were born in the wilderness—then they had not circumcised.] Since they never were removed from Mount Sinai, where it is likely there was a general circumcision, as there was now to be before their celebrating the passover, which had not been kept since that time.

Ver. 6] These words seem to give the reason why they were not circumcised, because they were in a wandering condition, while they remained in the wilderness, and did not know when the cloud would remove from the tabernacle to lead them to another place; which if it had done when children were newly circumcised, their lives might have been endangered by motion, while they were sore. This, a great many think, made Moses dispense with circumcision by God's direction. We do not find him, indeed, consulting God about it; but he was satisfied that God approved of this reason for the omission of it. R. Jesse, as Mr. Selden observes, gives this account of the whole business: "The Israelites kept but one passover all the time they were in the wilderness; the reason was, in that year (which was the next to that wherein they came out of Egypt), their tents were pitched in a place where they might safely circumcise the males that had been lately born, lest the neglect of it should hinder the legitimate eating of the passover. But in all the time following, wherein they wandered in the desert, they did not circumcise their children, because of their incommodious journeys, and the danger of circumcision by the way; so that they could keep no more passovers till the return. This was better than what many of them give, who say circumcision was omitted, because the north wind never blew all the time they were in the wilderness; and wounds are very dangerous when it doth not blow. Whence their medical maxim mentioned in the Talmud: "In cloudy days and when the east wind blows, we neither circumcise nor open a vein" (see Buxtorf, Synagog. Judaeorum). But if this matter be well considered, we cannot rest satisfied with the foregoing reason; for all the time they were in the wilderness, children were born, and women lay in; and there was greater danger by their motion, while they were in labour, and when they were newly brought to bed, than there was in their children being circumcised, who were sore but for a few days; whereas the others were not fit to go abroad, or to travel, in a great many. For which, and for several other reasons, Fortunatus Saccachus thinks this was not the cause why they were not circumcised during their travels in the wilderness; but the true reason was, that they did not look upon the precept of circumcision as obliging them, till they came to settle in the land of Canaan; for in the covenant which Moses made with them at Mount Sinai, there is nothing said about circumcision, unto which they were bound by the covenant made with Abraham (as our Saviour observeth, John vii. 21), and that runs thus: "I will give unto thee, and unto thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, &c. Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee, &c. Every man-child shall be circumcised" Gen. xvi. 8—10 (see Saceror. Elseochrysm. Myrothec. 2, cap. 54).

Ver. 7. Their children,—Joshua circumcised.] Now that they were come to their rest in the land of promise.

For they were uncircumcised.] For the reason above mentioned, to which this may be added, that several great men (such as Theodoret and St. Jerome among the ancients) think that circumcision, being a note of distinction between the Israelites and other people, there was no need of it in the wilderness, when (as Cedrenus speaks) they were πάντες ὁμογενεῖς χιτωρερμένοι, separated from all strangers by the wilderness itself. Others think, that the mixed multitude of Egyptians, who, moved by the miracles they had seen done in their country, went out of it with the Israelites, and joined themselves to them, were the cause of this omission; for they could not presently incorporate with them by receiving circumcision; and therefore it was suspended, that these Egyptians might not look upon themselves as quite different people: but longer than till they came to Canaan they would not have it discontinued, when all, Egyptians as well as Israelites, received it, that they might not be upbraided as a people of a different original. And as the omission of it in the desert made the proselytes who came out of Egypt equal with the Israelites, while they stayed there; so, as a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) suggests, it might be observed, that this absolute necessity of this rite, and that it could not be of eternal obligation.

Ver. 8. They abode in their places in the camp.] Lay still without motion (which would have hindered the healing of the sore), and had not the least disturbance given them by the people of Canaan.

Till they were whole.] Which they were against the passover; for during the eleventh day for one, there were four days between their circumcision and the passover, which was not kept till the fourteenth day at even, when the pain was pretty well over, for it was smartest on the third day (see upon Gen. xxxiv. 25).

Ver. 9. This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt.] It is commonly thought, that by the reproach of Egypt is meant nothing else but uncircumcision, with which the Israelites always reproached other people, particularly the Egyptians, among whom they had long dwelt, and with whom they were best acquainted. But our learned Dr. Spencer thinks "the reproach of Egypt" is the slavery to which they had been there long subject, which they were fully declared a free people by receiving the mark of the seed of Abraham, and made heirs of the have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day.

10 ¶ And the children of Israel encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month at even in the plains of Jericho.

11 And they did eat of the old corn of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes, and parched corn in the selfsame day.

12 ¶ And the manna ceased on the morrow promised land. This he very often repeats, lib. i. De Leg. Hebr. Ritual. cap. 4. p. 41, 51, 55. And no doubt Joshua now chose, immediately upon their entrance into the land of Canaan, to cause them to be circumcised, not only as a token they peculiarly belonged to him, but to oblige them to be careful to observe all the laws of God; many of which could not, and others were not observed in the wilderness, but were now to be regularly practised, because they held the land of Canaan by this tenure. To this purpose also Theodoret discourses, in his questions upon this subject. They were now lords of the promised land, who were lately slaves in Egypt: for they could not be the legitimate children of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and heirs of the promises made to them, till they were circumcised. Ralbag hath another notion of it; That the Egyptians seeing the Israelites wander so long as they did in the wilderness, reproached and flouted them, as if they were brought thither to be destroyed, and not to possess the land of Canaan; from which reproaches God now delivered them, when he assured them, by enjoining their circumcision, that they should shortly enjoy that country which God promised; but which no uncircumcised person might inherit: but the first is the plainest and most unconstrained sense.

'The name of the place is called Gilgal' This was the first original of the name, which this place had ever after; for Gatul, in Hebrew, from whence this word comes, signifies to remove, take away, or devote. And so here the LXX. translate the word gollath (I have rolled away) by ἀφελείαν, and the Vulgar Latin by abstulit (I have taken away); which makes it strange that they should have used the LXX. words, which were the true literary words in the Hebrew, for they were then lords of the promised land, and might have been as free from reproaches as they were from the Egyptians, and from all the troubles they endured in the wilderness.

Unto this day.] These words are alluded by some against Joshua's being the author of this book; to which an answer hath been given, iv. 9.

Ver. 10. Encamped in Gilgal] Continued their camp there, as they were enjoined, ver. 8.

Kept the passover] Which was the second passover that had been kept since its first institution, the first being observed the second year after their coming out of Egypt at Mount Sinai; after which it had been omitted for some years, because many of the people were uncircumcised.

On the fourteenth day of the month] According to the command of God (Exod. xii. 6).

In the plains of Jericho] Where the tabernacle was in the midst of their camp, unto which they brought their lamb, for it could be sacrificed nowhere else (Deut. xvi. 2). And therefore hither the Reubenites, and Gadites, and Manassites, on the other side Jordan, came to offer this sacrifice; which was easier for them, than it was in aftertimes to go up to Jerusalem.

Ver. 11. They did eat of the old corn of the land] Vol. 1. 119 after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more: but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.

13 ¶ And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand: and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?

Which the people of the country had left in their barns when they fled into Jericho, and other strong holds.

The morrow after the passover] There is a great dispute among the Jews, whether this were the fifteenth day of the month, which was properly the next day after the passover, or, as others take it, the sixteenth day, which was the solemn Sabbath kept on the first day of unleavened bread (Lev. xxii. 10, 11), when they were to wave the sheaf of the first-fruits before the Lord. The former are in the right.

Unleavened cakes] That is, they kept the feast of unleavened bread, which was distinct from the passover, as I observed, Exod. xii. 15. &c.

And parched corn] This was new corn, which was growing that year they entered into Canaan, of which it was not lawful to eat, till they had offered the sheaf before mentioned (Lev. xxii. 14), and therefore it is made an argument by some, that it was the sixteenth day of this month when this corn was parched.

Ver. 12. Neither had the children of Israel manna any more] Because they had no need of it (as Kimchi and others interpret it) being supplied by the store of old corn which they found in the land of Canaan, and by what was growing upon the ground.

But they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.] After they had offered the sheaf before mentioned (Lev. xxii. 11). So that manna ceased on the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the first month, having continued with them forty years, wanting about a month. R. Bechay truly interprets these words (Exod. xvi. 35), not to be complete, but near forty years; for it began to fall on the fifteenth day of the second month, and ceased on the sixteenth or seventeenth day of the first month of the fortieth year after they came out of Egypt; and therefore, to show that they were not to expand those words, They did eat manna forty years, in a strict and precise sense, Moses immediately adds, until they came to a land inhabited;—they did eat manna until they came to the borders of the land of Canaan; which was exactly fulfilled, Gilgal being on the borders of the land, where it now ceased; but it continued till that time, though they came to a land inhabited, when they conquered the kingdoms of Sihon and Og.

Ver. 13. When Joshua was by Jericho] After he had performed the solemn rites of circumcision and the passover, Joshua went to take a view of Jericho, and to observe, as generals are wont to do, the approaches to it.

That he lifted up his eyes and looked] These words signify a sudden apparition of a person to him; for so this phrase is used, when something new and unexpected presents itself, as one is intent upon something else (Gen. xviii. 1, Dan. x. 5).

There stood a man over against him] Whom he took to be a man.
JOSHUA.

14 And he said, Nay; but as captain of the host of the Lord am I now come. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, What saith my lord unto his servant?

With his sword drawn] He seemed to be a soldier, or rather a great commander, and stood directly opposite to him. Joshua went unto him.] Such was his undaunted courage, with which God had inspired him. Are thou for us, or for our adversaries?] He demands of him, whether he came to help the Israelites, or the people of Canaan; for whom (it appears by the answer) Joshua suspected he came to fight. Ver. 14. And he said, Nay.] i. e. I am not on the side of your adversaries. But as captain (or prince) of the host of the Lord am I now come.] By the "host of the Lord" is here meant the whole body of the people of Israel, whom the Lord himself led forth out of Egypt, as his army (see Exod. xii. 44), and now appeared in this manner, that he might show he would still conduct them, as their chief commander and leader, by whom they should be victorious over their enemies: for though many take this to have been a created angel (Michael, suppose, the chief of them), yet it is evident that Joshua did not think him so to be, for he fell down and worshipped him, as we read in the words following. Joshua fell on his face.] With the profoundest reverence. Did worship.] Which he durst not have given (for God alone is to be adored), nor would an angel have received, without such a check as an angel gave St. John (Rev. xxi. 10), if he had not taken him to be the Divine Word that was to come to fight for them. So the Chaldee paraphrase upon Joshua x. 12. "It was the Word of the Lord that fought for them," according to God's promise, i. 9, 17. This a most learned friend of mine (Dr. Alix) shows was the judgment of the ancient Jewish church (see his late book on that argument, p. 234), and it is most certain was the judgment of the ancient Christians, particularly of Justin Martyr, Eusebius, and Theodoret (see Valerius in his Annotations upon Eusebius's Ecclesiastical History, lib. ii. cap. 2, p. 7). And therefore our great prince of Ireland fears not to say in his Annals, "Jesus Dominus noster, princeps militiae patris sui, Jesu typic ad

15 And the captain of the Lord's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy. And Joshua did so.

Jerihonem gladio stricto apparentes, promittit se populum defensum," that is, "Jesus our Lord, the Prince of his Father's host, appearing to him, who was a type of him at Jericho, with a drawn sword, promised to be the defender of the people:" where he seems by the "captain of the Lord's host" to understand our Lord, who commands angels themselves; for they are sometimes called "the host of heaven" (1 Kings xxi. 12. Luke ii. 13). And it may very well be thought the meaning here.

What saith my Lord unto his servant?] Joshua was possessed of such a deep sense of the greatness of this person, that he humbly desires to receive his commands, and he would obey them. Ver. 15. Loose thy shoe from off thy foot; for the place whereon thou standest is holy.] This is the fullest evidence that can be given of the Divinity of this person that appeared to him; who was so far from reviving him for doing him too much honour, that he commanded him to do much more; for that which he here requires, is the highest acknowledgment of a Divine presence that was used among the eastern nations, as the same Dr. Alix observes. And considering that these are the very same words which were spoken to Moses, Exod. iii. 2, 3, we learn the reason why God commanded this to Joshua; which was, for the strengthening of his faith, that as now he was placed in Moses's stead, so God would be with him, as he had been with Moses. And thus Joh. à Coch discourses very reasonably upon the Gemara of the Sanhedrin, cap. 6, n. 3. "This angel, who suffered himself to be worshipped, and by whose presence the place where he appeared was sanctified, so that Joshua was commanded to put off his shoes, no doubt was He whom all the angels in heaven worship." Joshua did so.] Put off his shoes, in token of reverence to that place; which was holy, while that Divine presence remained there, though not after it was gone; and it continued there for some space of time, to give Joshua advice, and to encourage him to hope for his protection and assistance; as appears from ver. 2, of the next chapter.

CHAPTER VI.

1 Jericho is shut up. 2 God instructeth Joshua how to besiege it. 12 The city is compassed. 17 It must be accursed. 20 The walls fall down. 22 Rahab is saved. 26 The builder of Jericho is cursed.

I Now Jericho was straitly shut up because of the children of Israel: none went out, and none came in.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. Now Jericho was straitly shut up] The Targum understands it as if he spake of the strong fortifications of Jericho, which made it needful Joshua should be encouraged in his enterprise against it. But the words in the Hebrew are literally (as is noted in the margin of our Bibles) "did shut up, and was shut up," which plainly relates to the strict guards which were kept, that none could get into the city, nor get out of it: so it is explained in the next words.

2 And the Lord said unto Joshua, See, I have given into thine hand Jericho, and the king thereof, and the mighty men of valour.

None went out, and none came in.] They shut up their gates so close, that none could go out to carry intelligence to Joshua; and they were blocked up so close by the Israelites (to which the latter part of the foregoing words may perhaps refer), that none could get in to bring any intelligence or relief to the inhabitants of Jericho. Ver. 2. The Lord said unto Joshua.] The same person speaks to him (all agree) who is called the "Prince of the Lord's host" in the foregoing chapter; and here is called Jehovah. Which shows he was
And ye shall compass the city, all ye men of war, and go round about the city once. Thus shalt thou do six days.

And seven priests shall bear before the ark seven trumpets of rams' horns: and the seventh day ye shall compass the city seven times, and the priests shall blow with the trumpets.

And it shall come to pass, that when they make a long blast with the ram's horn, and when ye hear the sound of the trumpet, all the people shall shout with a great shout; and the wall of the city shall fall down flat, and the people shall ascend up every man straight before him.

And Joshua the son of Nun called the priests, and said unto them, Take up the ark of the covenant, and let seven priests bear seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the Lord.

And he said unto the people, Pass on, and compass the city, and let him that is armed pass on before the ark of the Lord.

And it came to pass, when Joshua had spoken unto the people, that the seven priests bearing the seven trumpets of rams' horns passed on before the Lord, and blew with the trumpets: and the ark of the covenant of the Lord followed them.

And the armed men went before the priests that blew with the trumpets, and the rearward came after the ark, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets.

And Joshua had commanded the people, fall of walls; in which they suppose another miracle.

The people shall ascend up every man straight before him.] The whole wall did not fall down, for Rahab's house stood, which was upon the wall (ii. 15). But such wide breaches were made everywhere round about, that the Israelites went straight forward, and found an easy entrance into this city, which the ancient inhabitants had no heart to defend; or, rather, the whole wall sunk into the earth, only Rahab's house was left standing, which made the thing more remarkable. And thus God demonstrated, that it was his wonderful power which overthrew the city, against which they brought no engines nor battering rams, &c., Καὶ δὲ μὲν ὁ πόλις ἀργυρὸς καὶ πετρεμένη, καὶ ἐκείνη ἐπιστρώθη, &c., as Epiphanius speaks, Heres. lxxvi. n. 83.

Ver. 3. Go round about the city once.] At such a distance, I suppose, that they could not reach them from the city, with their arrows or stones sent against them.

Thus shall thou do six days.] Once every of those days, in such order as is described, ver. 6—9. This looked not like making war; but appeared to the besieged, it is probable, as a pastime.

Ver. 4. Seven trumpets of rams' horns.] Such trumpets as they used to blow withal in the year of jubilee (Lev. xxv. 9), for so the phrase is in the Hebrew, "trumpets of Jobel:" and I have observed elsewhere, that rams' horns not being hollow, trumpets could not be made of them.

And ye shall compass the city seven times.] The seventh day's march differed in two things from the other six: that they compassed it but once on other days, and made not the least noise, but now seven times, and made a great shout at the end of the last circuit. Concerning this number seven, see Drusius upon this place, and upon Lev. iv. 6. Grotius saith of it, in short (upon 2 Chron. xxxix. 21), heptas sacris propria; "the number seven is proper to sacred things:" as appears by the seven angels and seven trumpets (Rev. viii. 2).

The priests shall blow] All the times they marched so often round the city (see Tertullian, lib. ii. adv. Marcion, cap. 21).

Ver. 5. That when they make a long blast.] A loud sound used after a rustic manner, as Bochart it interprets it in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 43. When ye hear the sound of the trumpets.] And were commanded by Joshua to shout (ver. 16).

All the people shall shout with a great shout.] Such as soldiers use when they make an onset upon a place, or when armies meet to give battle.

The wall of the city shall fall down flat.] Or, fall under it, as it is in the Hebrew; which seems to signify, that the foundations of the wall were subverted, so that it sunk and fell into the ditch, or (as the Jews explain it) sunk into the very ground on which it stood, so as to leave no ruins, as in the common saying, Ye shall not shout, nor make any noise with your voice, neither shall any word proceed out of your mouth, until the day I bid you shout; then shall ye shout.

11 So the ark of the LORD compassed the city, going about it once: and they came into the camp, and lodged in the camp.

12 ¶ And Joshua rose early in the morning, and the priests took up the ark of the LORD.

13 And seven priests bearing seven trumpets of rams' horns before the ark of the LORD went on continually, and blew with the trumpets: and the armed men went before them; but the rearward came after the ark of the LORD, the priests going on, and blowing with the trumpets.

14 And the second day they compassed the city supply that word from ver. 4, as they do also ver. 13, where this is again repeated.

Ver. 10. It shall not shout, nor make any noise] They were not to talk to one another as they went along, but march in a profound silence, before and after the Lord, waiting on him, to see what he would do for them.

Until the day I bid you shout.] That is, on the seventh day, after they had compassed the city seven times.

Ver. 11. So the ark of the Lord compassed the city, going about it once:] It is uncertain upon what day they began to do this; but it is very probable (as the Jews say in their larger Chronicle) that it was the next day after the seven days of unleavened bread were ended.

And lodged in the camp.] They spent the rest of the day in the camp to refresh themselves, and lay there till the following night.

The priests took up the ark:] These words, and those that follow in the next verse, give a particular account of what was done on the first day, according to that which was said in general, ver. 8, 9.

Ver. 13. Seven priests went on continually.] Without resting or making any stop, in a continued motion, till they had finished their circuit.

Blew] As soon as they began their motion.

The priests going on, and blowing with their trumpets.] Till they had ended their circuit.

Ver. 14. The second day they compassed the city once.] In the same order before described.

Returned into the camp.] As they had done the first day (ver. 11).

So they did six days.] The remaining four days were spent in the same pompous show, without striking a stroke, or speaking a word, that the subversion of the city might be ascertained wholly to the power of God, which secretly undermined the walls, and threw them down.

Ver. 15. On the seventh day.] The Jewish writers say this was the Sabbath, as Raymundus observes in his Pugio Fidei, and Jos. de Voysin in his Annotations upon him, p. 625. But I shall only mention the words of Kimchi, which are these: “The ark of the Lord compassed the city the first time, on the first day of the week; so our doctors, of pious memory, have delivered, that the seventh day wherein the city was taken was the Sabbath, though they killed and burnt upon that day: for he that commanded the Sabbath to be observed, commanded it now to be profaned for the destruction of Jericho, as he commanded burnt-offerings to be sacrificed on this day:” which is the very instance whereby our blessed Saviour justifies his doing some works upon the Sabbath-day. And here I cannot but note, that it was Jehovah, according to this explication, who gave this command to compass the city on this day as well as any other, in order to teach the great Lord who gave the command to keep the Sabbath now dispenseth with it: he that spake from Mount Sinai was the person who appeared to Joshua: for, whether this day was the Sabbath or not, it is certain, one of the seven days wherein they were thus employed was the Sabbath, and consequently their resting on that day was dispensed with, by the same authority that made the law of the Sabbath.

They rose early about the dawn of the day.] All the six days, I suppose, they rose early, as they did upon the first (ver. 19); but upon this day, very early, as soon as they could see, because they had seven times as much work to do as they had upon the other days.

And compassed the city—seven times.] Not with a continued motion, I suppose, but resting awhile (perhaps after each circuit) to refresh themselves; otherwise, by such motion, they might have been dispirited, and unfit to attack Jericho, when the wall of it fell down before them.

Only on that day they compassed the city seven times.] For so the Lord ordered, ver. 4.

Ver. 16. At the seventh time.] As soon as they had ended the seventh circuit.

When the priests blew] Such a long sound as is mentioned ver. 5.

Joshua said unto the people.] By such officers as he had appointed to give the order, when they heard that unusual sound of the trumpet.

Shout.] In assured hope of victory, as it follows in the next words, “for the Lord hath given you the city.”

Ver. 17. The city shall be accursed.] All the commands given in this and in the two following verses could not be delivered just before he bade them shout, but they had been given some time before they began to march the seventh time about the city. And if any thing of these matters was repeated now, it was very briefly, by bidding them remember the orders they had received concerning the city and all that was therein.

I have observed elsewhere, that this word cherem (which we translate accursed) signifies sometimes the gift itself, which is devoted to God for his use (Lev. xxviii. 24), sometimes that which is devoted to perpetual destruction, by the right which God hath to punish capital enormities to him, as here in this place. And thus, Mr. Selden observes, the great Sanhedrin might devise those to destruction who in war did not observe such charges as were given them; of which they find an instance in Judg. xxx. 5 (see him, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 6).
CHAPTER VI.

18 And ye, in any wise keep yourselves from the accursed thing; lest ye make yourselves accursed, when ye take of the accursed thing; and make the camp of Israel a curse, and trouble.

19 But all the silver, and gold, and vessels of brass and iron, are consecrated unto the Lord: they shall come into the treasury of the Lord.

20 So the people shouted when the priests blew with the trumpets: and it came to pass, when the people heard the sound of the trumpets, and the people shouted with a great shout, that the wall fell down flat, so that the people went up into the city, every man straight before him, and they took the city.

21 And they utterly destroyed all that was in the city, both man and woman, young and old, and ox, and sheep, and ass, with the edge of the sword.

22 But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country, Go into the harlot's house, and bring out thence the woman, and all that she hath, as ye sware unto her.

23 And the young men that were spies went in, and brought out Rahab, and her father, and her mother, and her brethren, and all that she had; and they brought out all her kindred, and left them without the camp of Israel.

24 And they burnt the city with fire, and all that was therein: only the silver, and the gold, and the vessels of brass and of iron, they put into the treasury of the house of the Lord.

Even it, and all that are therein] As the first-fruits of their victories in the land of Canaan. All whose inhabitants God ordered to be exterminated; but thought fit to make such an example of the first that refused to submit, as to raise their very city, and command it never to be built again: for that this was done, that they could make no example, 1 Kings xvi. 34. Thus he commanded even such cities in Israel to be destroyed as should hereafter revolt to idolatry, Deut. xiii. 15—17.

Only Rahab—and all that are with her] Which is explained in the execution of this order, ver. 23.

Because she hid the messengers] Who sware unto her that she should be preserved; and therefore, both in justice and gratitude, Joshua was bound to take care of her; and no doubt had order from God to make good the oath of the spies.

That we sent.] This seems to import that Joshua sent the spies by the advice or consent of the elders; though it may signify no more but that he sent them upon a public account (see ch. ii. 1, 22).

Ver. 18. Keep yourselves from the accursed thing.] Take heed, lest you meddle with any of the spoils which are devoted to God, and appropriate them to your own use.

Lest ye make yourselves accursed.] Bring yourselves under the same sentence of being devoted to destruction.

And make the name of Israel a curse.] And, more than that, expose the whole camp to the same danger. For many times God takes occasion to punish the whole body of a people for their other sins, when some of them only have highly offended him.

Trouble it.] Disturb the course of their victories.

Ver. 19. But all the silver, and gold, &c.] And other metals, I suppose.

Are consecrated unto the Lord.] Except the gold and silver of their images, which were utterly to be destroyed, according to an express command of God, Deut. vii. 25, 26.

They shall come into the treasury of the Lord.] Which was in the tabernacle. To the service of which such things were wholly appropriated, and might not be applied to any other use. But it is very probable, that before such things were put into the treasury, they were purified, by making them go through the fire: according to the law, Numb. xxxi. 22, 23. The Jews think these things were given to God, because the city was taken on the Sabbath.

Ver. 20. So the people shouted.] As they had been commanded, ver. 16.

The people shouted] This is repeated, to show that this was all that the people contributed to the expugnation of this city; which they wholly ascribed unto God.

The wall fell down] As the Lord had promised, ver. 5.

So that the people went up into the city.] As it was easy to do when the garrison was in such a consternation at the sudden fall of the wall, without any visible force to throw it down; that in all likelihood they might have fallen into each other's hands.

Ver. 21.] See Deut. xx. 16, 17. Some have observed that there are no camels here mentioned, which were not commonly bred in this country; much less mules, which were not known in the land of Israel till the days of David. As Bochart concludes, from the mention upon several occasions of oxen, sheep, and asses, but not of camels, even in the distance of Babylon, besides these here named, they were all killed; for that was the law of the cherem. As for their killing of infants and women, see Grotius lib. iii. De Juris Belli et Pacis, cap. 4, sect. 9. And it must also be remembered, that they were a people guilty of such foul idolatry, that it was fit the whole race of them should be destroyed, as Sodom was; where all the children perished, as well as others. And this was a type of the entire destruction of New Babylon, mentioned in the Revelation.

Ver. 22. But Joshua had said unto the two men that had spied out the country.] He had given this order before the falling of the wall; when they began their march on the seventh day, the seventh time, and before they shouted.

Go into the harlot's house.] Which, by the wonderful providence of God over her, was left standing, with part of the wall upon which it was built, when the rest sunk into the ground.

All that she hath.] With her in the house.

As ye sware unto her.] Ch. ii. 14.

Ver. 23. They brought out all her kindred.] By this it appears, that all related to her who took shelter under her roof were preserved from destruction. Such is the great clemency of God, who, for the sake of one excellent woman, spared a great many that had done nothing to deserve his favour.

Left them without the camp.] They were brought out of the house, because it was to be burnt with all the rest of the city: which was to be laid desolate without inhabitant. And they were carried without the camp of Israel, because it was holy by the presence of the Lord there: which made it unlawful for them to enter into it till they had abjured their gentile superstition; and by circumcision (and by baptism, as the custom was in after times, if not now) admitted into the body of the Israelites.

Ver. 24. They burnt the city with fire.] By the just judgment of God upon it, for the horrible wickedness
Joshua.

25 And Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, and her father's household, and all that she had; and she dwelleth in Israel even unto this day; because she hid the messengers, which Joshua sent to spy out Jericho.

26 ¶ And Joshua adjured them at that time, committed therein (see Grotius, De Jure Belli et Paxis, lib. iii. cap. 12, sect. 9).

Only the silver.—they put into the treasury, &c.] As had been enjoined before they took the city, ver. 19.

Ver. 25. Joshua saved Rahab the harlot alive, &c.] It is likely her father and his household gave credit to what she said; and consequently were converted, as she was, to the true religion, by what they had heard before and now saw with their own eyes, of the wonderful works of God.

She dwelleth in Israel even unto this day.] Was incorporated with the Israelites and made a member of their body; as all her kindred, it is likely, were: at least they became proselytes of the gate (as they called those who renounced idolatry, and worshipped the God of Israel), though they were not circumcised. Concerning this phrase, "unto this day," see before, iv. 9.

Because she hid the messengers,] Which proceeded not merely from her humanity, but was a noble act of courageous faith.

Ver. 26. Joshua adjured them at that time, saying,] He made the elders and heads of their several tribes (I suppose) bind themselves by a solemn oath, and they took the same security of all the people; adding a curse upon themselves and their posterity if any of them broke this oath.

Cursed be the man before the Lord,] This shows that this cherem, whereby he adjured him and his family to destruction who should rebuild Jericho, was a sentence pronounced by the Lord, and not by Joshua without his order. And so we read expressly in the first book of the Kings, xvi. ult. See concerning this cherem, Mr. Selden, lib. iv. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 7, p. 505.

That riseth up and buildeth this city Jericho.] Whose ruins God would have remain, as a perpetual monument of his power and of his severity. So Maimon, in his More Novoehim, par. iii. cap. 30. This anathema (saith he) was pronounced, that the miracle of the subversion of Jericho might be kept in perpetual memory: for whosoever saw the walls sunk deep into the earth (as he understands it), would clearly discern that it was not the form of a building destroyed by man, but miraculously thrown down by God."

He shall lay the foundation thereof in his firstborn,] That is, in the death of his first-born.

In his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it.] The meaning is, in the progress of the work the rest of his children should die; and when he had finished (which was when he "set up its gates") he should lose the last of them. Which was fulfilled exactly in the days of Ahaz, as we read in the place before named (1 Kings xvi. 34). Which, by the way, shows this book of Joshua to have been older than the book of the Kings.

We are not to imagine that this anathema reached any farther than to the builder of Jericho and his family; and to those who should inhabit it after it was rebuilt. For there was a company of prophets who made no scruple to settle here in future times (2 Kings i. 15). And if it had been built in any other place, and not on the ruins of the old city (though they had given it the name of Jericho), one cannot think he that built it would have fallen under this curse. Which either he did not mind, or did not believe, otherwise he would not have adventure to restore this city: unto which he was tempted by its pleasant situation (2 Kings i. 19).

Ver. 27. The Lord was with Joshua,] Thus God made good his promise to him, i. 5, 9, where the Targum, as I observed, hath it, "The Word of the Lord thy God shall be thy helper." And so these words run in that paraphrase, "And the Word of the Lord helped Joshua:" that Divine Person who appeared to him, and encouraged him in this undertaking, ch. v. 13, 14, &c.

His fame was noise[d] throughout all the country.] There was no part of the country which did not hear of their wonderful entrance into it over Jordan, and of the miraculous taking of Jericho, and the execution done there; which made the name of Joshua famous among them, as a captain before whom rivers fled, and the strongest walls fell down flat.

CHAPTER VII.

1 The Israelites are smitten at Ai. 6 Joshua's complaint. 10 God instructeth him what to do. 16 Achan is taken by the lot. 19 His confession. 22 He and all he had are destroyed in the valley of Achor.

1 Bor the children of Israel committed a trespass in the accursed thing: for Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took of the accursed thing: and the anger of the Lord was kindled against the children of Israel.

CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. But the children of Israel] That is, one among them. Which is an usual form of speech in the Holy Scripture, to ascribe that to many indefinitely wherein alone one is concerned; because where men are united in a society, they are all to partake in the good or evil that every of their members doth. Instances of which we find in Gen. vii. 4, xix. 29, xxiii. 6; Judges xii. 7; Matt. xxvi. 8. See Bochart in his Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 17, p. 313, and a great many more instances he heaps up, par. ii. lib. v. cap. 3, p. 669.

Committed a trespass.] Offended God by purloining to his own use some of the spoils which were devoted to destruction, or appropriated to God's treasury, with a curse upon him that meddled with them.

For Achan,] Who is called Acharel 1 Chron. ii. 7, because he having troubled Israel (as the word Achar signifies, ver. 23, of this chapter), it is likely that in after times they turned his name into Achar, instead of Achan.
2 And Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai, which is beside Beth-aven, on the east side of Beth-el, and spake unto them, saying, Go up and view the country. And the men went up and viewed Ai.

3 And they returned to Joshua, and said unto him, Let not all the people go up; but let about two or three thousand men go up and smite Ai; and make not all the people to labour thither; for they are but few.

4 So there went up thither of the people about three thousand men: and they fled before the men of Ai.

Son of Zabdi.] Who is called Zimmri, 1 Chron. ii. 6.
Son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah.] For we find Zerah was the son of Judah, and came with him into Egypt when he was very young; for we read of no children he had (Gen. xlv. 12). And if we suppose him to have beengetten Zabdi when he was seventy years old, as many years before Zabdi begat Carmi, and as many before Carmi begat Achan; we may make account (with Bonfrereius) that Achan was now about fifty years old; an age wherein many men begin to be more covetous than they were in their youth.

Vook of the accursed thing.] What it was he himself confesses, ver. 21.
The anger of the Lord was kindled.] The sin of one member of the body provoked the Divine Majesty to express his displeasure against them all (which they deserved upon other accounts), that they might be awakened to find out, and to punish him who had brought them into great danger.

This preface is made to this chapter, to show wherein the ill success they had at Ai proceeded.

Ver. 2. Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai.] Called Hai in Abraham's time (Gen. xii. 8), Which Joshua, I suppose, had summoned to surrender, according to the precept in Deut. xx. 10, but they had refused. It was a city about three miles distant from Jericho, as the Jews say in Semoth Rabbah; which Masius takes to signify the name of a mountain, in which lies the city of Beth-aven.

Which is beside Beth-aven.] Whether Beth-aven here signify a city, or a wilderness, is uncertain (see xviii. 12).

On the east side of Beth-el.] A place which was but one league from Ai, as Masius computes, and lay westward of it (Gen. xii. 8), for the war was carried on from the east, where Jericho was, to the western parts of the country. It was called Beth-aven, in future times, by way of reproach, when the golden calves were set up in it; which made it not a "house of God" (as Beth-el signifies), but a "house of iniquity;" i.e. idolatry, which is the import of Beth-aven.
But it is plain from hence, that these were two distinct places.

They went up and viewed Ai.] How it lay, and how it was fortified, &c. And it seems to have been seated in the hilly country and belonged to the Amorites (ver. 7).

Ver. 3.] They thought this number would be sufficient, because, as it follows in the end of the verse, they were but few; and therefore they would not have all Israel put to the trouble of marching thither. In which counsel a good providence of God interposed; for if the flight of three thousand men put the Israelites into such a consternation (as we read, ver. 5, 6), what a condition would they have been in, if all the people had been put to the worse! as they would have been, if they had attacked Ai, while this guilt remained among them.

5 And the men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men: for they chased them from before the gate even unto Shebarim, and smote them in the going down: wherefore the hearts of the people melted, and became as water.

6 ¶ And Joshua rent his clothes, and fell to the earth upon his face before the ark of the Lord until the eventide, he and the elders of Israel, and put dust upon their heads.

7 And Joshua said, Alas, O Lord God, wherefore hast thou at all brought this people over Jordan, to deliver us into the hand of the Amorites, to destroy us? would to God we had Ver. 4.] Who seeing so small a number, came out and engaged the Israelites; whose courage quite failed them, so that they seem not to have struck a stroke, but immediately ran away. For God had left them; to whom they owed all their valour and victories.

Ver. 5. The men of Ai smote of them about thirty and six men. Of the hindmost of them, it is most likely, who could not run away so fast as the rest.

Chased them from before the gate.] Of the city Ai.

Unto Shebarim.] A place, I suppose, between Ai and Jericho; which the Targum thinks had its name from the root of the Israelites there.

Smote them in the going down.] Till they came to the plains of Jericho. For Ai standing on a hill, there was a descent from thence thither.
The hearts of the people melted.] As wax doth before the fire (Ps. lxviii. 2), or as ice before the sun.

Become as water.] Weak and wavering, in uncertain resolutions, not knowing what to do.

Ver. 6. Joshua rent his clothes.] As the manner was when they were full of grief, upon occasion of any great calamity, or the commission of any great crime. Which custom was very ancient (Gen. xxxvii. 34, xliv. 13), and continued in the times of the prophets, who make it a crime that men did not rend their clothes when grievous sins were committed.

Fall to the earth.] To make his supplication to God for mercy.

Before the ark.] Not in the sanctuary, but with his face towards it. In imitation of which, the precursor in the Jewish synagogue, at this day, falls down before the chest, wherein they keep the book of the law, when he takes it out to read; as Buxtorf observes in his Synag. Judæa. And on solemn fast-days, as the Mischings tells, such prostrations were usual.

Until the eventide.] Continued all day in fasting and prayer to God.

He and the elders.] Who rent their clothes, I suppose, as he had done: and then presented themselves in this mournful manner before God to implore his mercy.

Put dust upon their heads.] This was still a higher expression of great grief, and of a deep sense of their unworthiness to be relieved. Which was very usual in this nation (1 Sam. iv. 12; 2 Sam. i. 2, &c.), and was imitated by the gentiles; as we see in the example of the Ninevites (Jonah iii. 6), and of Achilles, who bewailed the death of Patroclus by throwing dust upon his head, and lying down in the dust, as Homer describes it in Iliad Σ. ver. 23, 34.

Ver. 7. Alas, O Lord God.] A form of speech dolefully bewailing their forlorn condition: which did not misbecome so great a captain as Joshua was; for the most generous spirits have the most tender sense of humanity, as Arius Montanus excellently discourses upon this place.
been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan!

8 O Lord, what shall I say, when Israel turneth their backs before their enemies?

9 For the Canaanites and all the inhabitants of the land shall hear of it, and shall environ us round, and cut off our name from the earth: and what wilt thou do unto thy great name?

10 ¶ And the Lord said unto Joshua, Get thee up; wherefore liest thou thus upon thy face?

11 Israel hath sinned, and they have also transgressed my covenant which I commanded them: for they have even taken of the accursed thing, and have also stolen, and dissembled also, and they have put it even among their own stuff.

12 Therefore the children of Israel could not stand before their enemies, but turned their backs before their enemies, because they were accursed: neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed from among you.

13 Up, sanctify yourselves against to morrow: for thus saith the Lord God of Israel, There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel: thou canst not stand before thine enemies, until ye take away the accursed thing from among you.

14 In the morning therefore ye shall be Joshua, after the destruction of Jericho, had made inquiry, whether the silver and gold, &c., were brought into the treasury, and whether they had destroyed all other things, as God commanded; and they all answered, that they had.

They have put it even among their own stuff.] To conceal it from discovery: or, it is an expression of his impudent transgression of God's command, in converting it immediately to his own private use. For in this verse the crime is aggravated in a gradual manner, in that Achan had not only sinned, but against the command they had solemnly made with him; and now was it in a matter of great importance, in which he had lately laid his injunctions upon them: having not only taken to himself what belonged to God, but done it by way of stealth, as if he could not see it; and likewise denied the doing of it: and persisting in the sin, by mixing what he had stolen with his own proper goods.

Ver. 15. Because they were accursed.] By having a man among them who was fallen under the curse of God.

Neither will I be with you any more, except ye destroy the accursed from among you.] These words show that only one man among them was accursed, though they all suffered for it; and were to continue to suffer, till he was destroyed. For now that they knew that there had been such a crime committed among them, they had been as guilty as Achan if they had not punished it.

Ver. 16. Up.] He was not still lying on the ground, for God had bid him rise before, and he, I suppose, had obeyed him: but this is a word whereby he quickens him to make all the speed he could, to do as he was directed him.

Sanctify the people.] Call upon them to sanctify themselves; as it here follows.

Sanctify yourselves.] As they did when they were to meet the Lord at Mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 10, &c.), and as they were lately commanded to do when he led them over Jordan (li. 5). For now they were to appear before his majesty, that an inquisition might be made who he was that had been guilty of this foul crime.

To morrow:] For he would not have the guilt remain any longer upon them.

There is an accursed thing in the midst of thee, O Israel.] He speaks in this style both to awaken them to sanctify themselves, and also to appear before the Lord next morning.

Until ye take away the accursed thing from among you.] Both the person that had violated the anathema, and the thing he had purloined.

According to your tribes.] Some principal persons of every tribe, representing the rest, were set before the Lord.
It shall be, that the tribe which the Lord taketh, &c.] There is no difficulty in these words, but only to understand the true conception how this inquiry was made, and the author of the fact discovered: which is not here expressed, there being no words to signify how the Lord took one tribe, and family, and household, and person, from the rest. The Jews (who are never at a loss in these matters) tell us, that when they stood before the sanctuary, the high-priest was in it with the ark, and mantissa; wherein were twelve stones, with the name of the children of Israel engraven in them. And when that tribe, suppose, to which the guilty person belonged, was called, that stone in which was the name of that tribe changed colour; and so it did when the family, and the household, and the person, were called. But this is a mere fancy, of the stones shining, or becoming dusky; by which, I have shown elsewhere, answers could not be given to inquiries by urim and thummim. And what others of them say is not much better: for instance, Kimchi, who tells us some are of opinion, that they being made to pass before the ark, the guilty could not stir a foot (see several other conceits in Buxtorf's Historia Urin et Thummim, p. 304, &c.).

He and all that he hath.] His children, and his cattle; his tent, and all his goods; as it is explained ver. 24.

Because he hath transgressed.] See ver. 11.
He hath wrought folly.] Committed a very heinous sin.

Ver. 16. So Joshua rose up early.] It is probable he acquainted nobody with these orders; but made all the haste he could to put them in execution: for if they had been known abroad, Achan's guilt might have made him flee from so terrible a sentence. The tribe of Judah was taken.] Who, if we may believe the Jews, immediately stood to their arms, and would not lay them down, till they saw the man apprehended and punished who had done this thing.

Ver. 17. He brought the family of Judah.] Every family of that tribe, till that of the Zarthites was taken. Zarthites man by man.] That is, every head of their several households, as he was directed, ver. 14.

18 And he brought his household man by man; and Achan, the son of Carmi, the son of Zabdi, the son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was taken.

19 And Joshua said unto Achan, My son, give, I pray thee, glory to the Lord God of Israel, and make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done; hide it not from me.

20 And Achan answered Joshua, and said, Indeed I have sinned against the Lord God of Israel, and thus and thus have I done:

21 When I saw among the spoil a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight, then I coveted them, and took them; and, behold, they are hid in the earth in the midst of my tent, and the silver under it.

Zabdi was taken.] That is, the lot fell upon his household.

Ver. 18.] Here the Samaritan Chronicle tells the very same story with the Talmudists, that the stone in the breastplate of the high-priest, in which was engraved the name of Judah, was darkened when Achan was named (see Hottenger's S.nemga Orientale, cap. 8, p. 505).

Ver. 19. My son.] All great minds are full of tenderness and compassion; and nothing more unbecomes a prince than violent passion: which Joshua was so far from expressing on this occasion, that he speaks to him with the greatest mildness imaginable. Give—glory to the Lord God] The Samaritan Chronicle, before named, paraphrases this not amiss, 'Lift up thine eyes to the King of heaven and earth, and acknowledge that nothing can be hid from him; who knows the greatest secrets.'

Make confession unto him; and tell me now what thou hast done.] Openly confess thy guilt; and relate to me what it is, that thou hast converted to thine own use.

Hide it not from me.] Who thou seest have God at hand, to discover that which none of us know but thyself; this is the plainest translation of the matter is this, that they were discovered by casting of lots, in the presence of God; which was an usual way in aftertimes of discovering noxious persons (1 Sam. xiv. 41, 42; Jonah i. 7). So Josephus, lib. v. cap. 1, and Ralbag. Ver. 15. That he is taken with the accursed thing shall be burnt.] After they had stoned him to death with stones (ver. 23).

This and thus have I done.] Committed this sin, with such circumstances as here follow.

Ver. 20. Indeed I have sinned.] Which the Samaritan Chronicle thus expresses: 'I acknowledge that I have grievously sinned before God, who knows all secret and hidden things; for I have prevaricated against the covenant of God, and against his ambassador.'

A goodly Babylonish garment.] There are a great many opinions about this garment; which Bochartus most probably judges to have been a varnished garment, as the LXX.: that is, of divers colours, wherein were several figures either woven or wrought with a needle: for which sort of work Babylon was famous, insomuch that they were called painted garments; which made a most glorious show, and therefore was very inviting to the eye of Achan: who was tempted by its lustre, to reserve one of these garments for his own use, or to sell; for they were of an immense price. See him in his Phalug, lib. I. cap. 6, where he hath a long dissertation about this garment.

Two hundred shekels of silver.] Which is as much as a hundred German dollars, as Masius observes.

Chapter VII.
So Joshua sent messengers, and they ran unto the tent; and, behold, it was hid in his tent, and the silver under it.

And they took them out of the midst of the tent, and brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel, and laid them out before the Lord.

And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and the silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold, and his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his ass, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had: and they brought them unto the valley of Achor.

And Joshua said, Why hast thou troubled us? the Lord shall trouble thee this day. And all Israel stoned him with stones, and burned them with fire, after they had stoned them with stones.

And they raised over him a great heap of stones, "it relates to his oxen, and asses, and sheep, which were stoned with him" (see Gull. Vorstius, in his annotations on Pirke Eleizer, p. 284).

All that he had.] This was done, to represent to the people the heinousness of this offence; and to strike such a terror into them, that they should not dare to commit the like.

They brought them unto the valley of Achor.] Which had its name from him, ver. 26 (see there).

By the silver under it.] The silver was immediately under the Babylonish garment, and the gold under that: for both silver and gold are here meant, though one only mentioned.

Ver. 32, So Joshua sent messengers.] Least any one should remove them, and render the fact dubious: and that the children of Israel might be speedily expiated.

It was hid in his tent, and the silver under it.] They found the Babylonish garment (as was said before) hid in the earth, and the silver and gold under it. Thus LX. indeed, understand it, as if the gold and Babylonish garment were uppermost, and the silver under them: for so they translate these words both here and in the foregoing verse, τὸ δίασπρατον ἐποιέωντος καὶ τῶν χρυσίων, "the silver under them." The wedge of gold, perhaps, was wrapped in the Babylonish garment; and so the silver might be said to lie either under it, or over them.

Ver. 23. They took them out.] Where he told them he had buried these things.

Brought them unto Joshua, and unto all the children of Israel.] For they were all assembled at the tabernacle, waiting to see the issue of this matter.

Laid them out before the Lord.] That the fact might be manifest, and the Lord acknowledged to be omniscient.

Ver. 24. And Joshua, and all Israel with him.] By an universal consent.

Took Achan the son of Zerah.] He was Zerah's great-grandchild.

The silver, and the garment, and the wedge of gold.] Which God would not have put into his treasury, after they had been thus perverted to a private use.

His sons and his daughters.] This seems very hard, that they should be executed in such a terrible manner, as here follows, for their father's fault. But the Jews in Pirke Eleizer say, they were punished because they were privy to their father's stealth, and concealed it. Othert have this was a necessary severity in the beginning of a new empire, and of a plentiful fortune, upon which they now entered; that they might not wantonly abuse it. But there are those who think this is but a seeming differently: Achan alone being stoned (as we read in the next verse, "all Israel stoned him with stones"), and his children brought forth to be spectators of it. And when it is said, in the conclusion of the next verse, "they...
CHAP. VII.

Ver. 1. The Lord said unto Joshua.] Who, it is likely, now consulted God about their progress in this war: which he had not done before (vii. 2), being sufficiently authorized by what God had often said to him, and by their success against Jericho: but this late defeat, before Ai, might make him think it necessary to take advice of the Divine Majesty, before he attempted any thing farther.

Fear not,] Because of the late ill success; of which he now knew the cause, which was removed.

Take all the people of war with thee,] This order may seem strange, since the people themselves thought two or three thousand were sufficient, if God were with them. But God would have them all to share in the spoil of Ai; that they who had obeyed him in abstaining from laying their hands on any thing in Jericho, might be now rewarded for it, by the prey of this city; as it follows in the next verse.

Go up to Ai.] Which it appears by this was in the hill country.

I have given into thy hand the king of Ai.] He bids him be confident of a complete victory, as if he had already won it.

Ver. 2. Thou shalt do to Ai—as thou didst unto Jericho.] Only with such difference as follows in the next words.

Only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves.] None of the silver or gold, or any thing else, was separated to God's use, nor ordered to be destroyed; but they were to enjoy it all entirely themselves.

Lay thee an ambush behind it.] On the west of it; for they were now in Gilgal, which lay eastward.

Ver. 3. So Joshua arose, and all the people of war,] In obedience to the Divine direction (ver. 1).

Sent them away by night.] When they were less liable to be observed.

Of that place was called, The valley of Achor, unto this day.

Achan, yet from henceforward they called him Achar the trouble of Israel. And so he is here called in the Syriac version, and by Josephus, Athanassius, Basil, and others mentioned by Bochartus; as Ezra himself also calls him, 1 Chron. ii. 7. See Hieroz. conc. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 31, in the latter end.

CHAPTER VIII.

1 God encourageth Joshua. 3 The stratagem whereby Ai was taken. 29 Th e king thereof is hanged.

1 And the Lord said unto Joshua, Fear not, neither be thou dismayed: take all the people of war with thee, and arise, go up to Ai: see, I have given into thy hand the king of Ai, and his people, and his city, and his land:

2 And thou shalt do to Ai and her king as thou didst unto Jericho and her king: only the spoil thereof, and the cattle thereof, shall ye take for a prey unto yourselves: lay thee an ambush for the city behind it.

3 ¶ So Joshua arose, and all the people of war, to go up against Ai: and Joshua chose out thirty thousand mighty men of valour, and sent them away by night.

4 And he commanded them, saying, Behold, ye shall lie in wait against the city, even behind the city: go not very far from the city, but be ye all ready:

5 And I, and all the people that are with me, will approach unto the city: and it shall come to pass, when they come out against us, as at the first, that we will flee before them,

6 (For they will come out after us) till we have drawn them from the city; for they will say, They flee before us, as at the first: therefore we will flee before them.

7 Then ye shall rise up from the ambush, and seize upon the city: for the Lord your God will deliver it into your hand.

8 And it shall be, when ye have taken the Ver. 4. Ye shall lie in wait against the city.] Like a great general, he assigns their post to every part of the army.

Go not very far from the city.] Lie as close to it as you can, without being discovered.

But be ye all ready.] To seize upon the city, when all the people were drawn out of it.

Ver. 5. And I, and all the people—will approach.] As if they intended to assault it.

When they come out against us, as at the first,] Which he rationally supposed they would, being flushed with such good success.

That we will flee before them,] Counterfeit a flight, as soon as they appeared.

Ver. 6. (For they will come out after us) Pursue them, with all their force.

Therefore we will flee before them.] He gives the reason of their flight, without striking of a stroke (as we now speak), that all the people might be enabled out of the city, in pursuit of them, as he concluded they would be; because now there was a greater number of the Israelites than before; which would require their whole power to deal withal.

Ver. 7. Then ye shall rise up from the ambush.] Upon the signal given, mentioned ver. 18.

The Lord your God will deliver it into your hand.] He would not have them fear to enter the city: which he assured them God would put in their possession.

Ver. 8. That ye shall set the city on fire.] The gate where they entered, or some of the skirts of the city, as a token they were possessed of it. For they were to take the spoil of the city before they burnt it (ver. 28).

According to the commandment of the Lord shall ye do.] And not transgress, as Achan did.

See, I have commanded you.] Acquainted them with the will of God; in the observance of which they might be confident of success.

Ver. 9. They went to lie in ambush.] He selected city, that ye shall set the city on fire: according to the commandment of the Lord shall ye do. See, I have commanded you.

9 ¶ Joshua therefore sent them forth: and they went to lie in ambush, and abode between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of Ai: but Joshua lodged that night among the people.

10 And Joshua rose up early in the morning, and numbered the people, and went up, he and the elders of Israel, before the people to Ai.

11 And all the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh, and came before the city, and pitched on the north side of Ai: now there was a valley between them and Ai.

12 And he took about five thousand men, and set them to lie in ambush between Beth-el and Ai, on the west side of the city.

13 And when they had set the people, even these thirty thousand men out of the rest of the army; and when it was dark they went upon the forenamed design.

Joshua lodged that night among the people.] The forenamed detachment (as we now speak), was commanded by some great officer, in whom Joshua confided; but he himself lay all night in the body of the army; that he might be ready in the morning to give the necessary orders.

Ver. 10. Numbered the people.] He first gave orders to the officers (for he could not do it himself alone) to see that none of the people were wanting.

He and the elders of Israel.] And when he commanded them to march, he was attended by the elders of Israel, leading them on towards Ai. But it is uncertain who are here meant by the "elders of Israel." Some think, the chief commanders in the army; but they are never called elders, much less the elders of Israel. But the rulers and judges are called by this name, who, I suppose, waited upon Joshua as a council of war: being men authorized by God to assist the supreme governor (Num. xi. 16, 24, 25).

Ver. 11. All the people, even the people of war that were with him, went up, and drew nigh.] The distance between Gilgal and Ai being but three leagues, it is likely the people being mustered early in the morning, they got thither before noon. Those words, "even the men of war that were with him," seem to be opposed to the thirty thousand, whom he had sent before to lie in ambush (ver. 3).

Pitched on the north side of Ai.] Here the main body of the army lay, behind the hills, it is likely, so that they were not discovered till the evening, or the next day.

There was a valley between them and Ai.] Where they of Ai, I suppose, drew up; when they resolved to engage them.

Ver. 12. Between Beth-el and Ai.] Which places were but a league distant one from the other (see v. 2).

On the west side.] Where the former detachment was ordered to lie, ver. 4. But these seem to have been a distinct party from them, and sent, it is likely, for another purpose; to intercept all those that might think to save themselves, by flying through by-ways, which they were to guard. There are those, indeed, who think that there were but thirty thousand men in all employed in this expedition against Ai; and out of them these five thousand men were sent to lie in ambush, that they might, in convenient time, set fire to the city (see Masius). But this is so directly contrary to God's command, to "take all the people of war with him," ver. 1. and to what is said, ver. 3. 11. that I cannot think it to be true. One had better say, this party was added to strengthen the thirty thousand men in their undertaking.

Ver. 13. When they had set the people.] That is, when things were thus disposed about the evening.

Joshua went into the midst of the valley.] To pray to God, it is likely, for a blessing upon their enterprise.

Ver. 14. When the king of Ai saw it.] That is, was informed of their investing the city on the north side of it; which, it is likely, was in the evening, or late that night.

That they hasted.] He called a council, and they speedily resolved to dislodge the Israelites.

The men of the city went out—he and all his people.] The meaning is, all that could fight went out, and their king at the head of them.

At a time appointed.] They had agreed all to issue out at several gates (it is likely) at a certain hour.

Before the plain.] He means, perhaps, the valley which lay between Ai and the camp of Israel; before which they drew up their army to engage the Israelites.

But he wist not that there were liers in ambush.] The king had no intelligence of that strong party, which Joshua had sent to lie behind the city; they keeping, I suppose, their gates shut (as they did at Jericho, that none could get in or go out, vi. 1), and suspecting no danger from the western coast where they lay, but only from the east, whence they knew the Israelites were to march.

Ver. 15. Joshua and all Israel made as if they were beaten.] At the first onset, Joshua himself turned his back, and all the rest of his army; as if they durst not stand before them.

And fled by the way of the wilderness.] Which lay between Jericho and Ai.

Ver. 16. All the people.] Who were able to fight.

Were called together to pursue after them.] I suppose some of the men of war might be left in the city till they saw the Israelites fly, and then they were all called out (as ver. 14. is to be understood) together with those of Beth-el, who were to come to their assistance; being near neighbours, and both under the same king.

They pursued after Joshua, and were drawn away from the city. They were so eager in their pursuit, that they were drawn to a greater distance from Ai than they would have been, if they had considered the danger of leaving it naked.
Beth-el, that went not out after Israel: and they left the city open, and pursued after Israel.

18 And the Lord said unto Joshua, Stretch out the spear that is in thy hand toward Ai; for I will give it into thine hand. And Joshua stretched out the spear that he had in his hand toward the city.

19 And the ambush arose quickly out of their place, and they ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand; and they entered into the city, and took it, and hasted and set the city on fire.

20 And when the men of Ai looked behind them, they saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended up to heaven, and they had no power to flee this way or that way: and the people that fled to the wilderness turned back upon the pursuers.

Ver. 17. There was not a man left in Ai.] None that were able to fight.

Or Bethel.] For they of Bethel, it appears by these words, were come to the assistance of Ai, before any of the army of Israel arrived: for afterward they could not, because the ambush lay between Bethel and Ai (ver. 9).

They left the city open, and pursued after Israel.] There was not so much as a man left to guard the gates; but all were engaged in the pursuit.

Stretch out the spear—toward Ai:] He bids him face about (as we now speak) and stop the flight of the Israelites. It is much disputed what the Hebrew word chalun signifies; which the Vulgar Latin translates a shield. But Bochartus hath taken a great deal of pains to show, that it everywhere signifies in Scripture a spear (as we translate it), or a lance, or some kind of such-like offensive weapon; especially in this place, he thinks, there can be no doubt of it; for it was a weapon he had in his hand, and was to stretch forth towards the city. It might be a signal to those in ambush to rise and enter the city, and to those who fled to make a stand, and encounter the enemy. To which purpose, nothing could be more proper than a spear, with a flag, it is highly probable, at the end of it (like to our ensigns), which made it more visible (see Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. cap. 8. p. 135. &c.) The LXX. here translate it ζυγώμων, which Suidas signifies a kind of weapon. sicut bigarum, "like to a spear." See the same most learned author, in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 42. p. 741. I will give it into thine hand.] As he promised ver. 1.

Joshua stretched out the spear—toward the city.] That all Israel might see it; as they did the rod of Moses, when they fought against Amalek.

They ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand:] Being admonished by some Divine suggestion (as Masius thinks) as well as by the signal, that now was the time to execute their design.

They ran as soon as he had stretched out his hand:] Which they might see from some of the hills, at the back of which they lay. But why they should watch for this sign, or understand what it meant, unless Joshua had received this order, and told it them before they went, cannot be conceived.

They entered into the city, and took it.] For there was nobody to oppose them.

21 And when Joshua and all Israel saw that the ambush had taken the city, and that the smoke of the city ascended, then they turned again, and slew the men of Ai.

22 And the other issued out of the city against them; so they were in the midst of Israel, some on this side, and some on that side: and they smote them, so that they let none of them remain or escape.

23 And the king of Ai took alive, and brought him to Joshua.

24 And it came to pass, when Israel had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai in the field, in the wilderness wherein they chased them, and when they were all fallen on the edge of the sword, until they were consumed, that all the Israelites returned unto Ai, and smote it with the edge of the sword.

And hasted and set the city on fire.] In one place; which, it is likely, was on the north side of the city; that both the Israelites and the people of Ai might see the smoke. This the Lord had strictly commanded (see ver. 8), which made them make such haste, as soon as they had possessed themselves of the city, to set fire to it.

Ver. 20. When the men of Ai looked behind them:] I suppose there was a great shout made by all the Israelites, when they saw the smoke ascend; which made the men of Ai look about them.

They saw, and, behold, the smoke of the city ascended] The firing of any out-houses, or barns, was sufficient to make such a smoke; for it is certain the city was not yet burnt (see ver. 28).

They had no power to flee this way or that way:] Either they were so dismayed, that they stood stock-still (as we speak), or found themselves so environed, that they could no way escape. For on the north and east sides, the great army came upon them; and on the west the ambush issued forth against them; and the other five thousand men blocked up their way on the south: which could not but very much amaze and perplex their minds; and the more, to see all their vain-glorious hopes vanished, which their king no doubt had entertained, of stopping the progress of the Israelites, and being the deliverer of his country.

The people—turned back upon the pursuers.] Ver. 15. They counterfeited a flight no longer, but now boldly looked their enemies in the face.

Ver. 21. When Joshua and all Israel saw] By this it is plain the whole body of the men were here; and not only three thousand of them, as some suppose (see ver. 19).

That the smoke of the city ascended.] Whereby they understood it was taken.

They turned again, and slew the men of Ai:] After they had made a stand awhile, and rallied, they fell upon the men of Ai, and made a great slaughter of them.

Ver. 22.] By this stratagem they were all entirely cut off.

Ver. 23.] Perhaps they were ordered so to do, that he might be made a public spectacle of the Divine vengeance.

Ver. 24. Had made an end of slaying all the inhabitants of Ai:] That is, the men of war.

In the wilderness wherein they chased them:] By this it appears, that they fled before the Israelites as soon as they turned upon them, having no heart to fight them (ver. 20), 25 And so it was, that all that fell that day, both of men and women, were twelve thousand, even all the men of Ai.

26 For Joshua drew not his hand back, wherewith he stretched out the spear, until he had utterly destroyed all the inhabitants of Ai.

27 Only the cattle and the spoil of that city Israel took for a prey unto themselves, according unto the word of the Lord which he commanded Joshua.

28 And Joshua burnt Ai, and made it an heap for ever, even a desolation unto this day.

29 And the king of Ai he hanged on a tree until eventide: and as soon as the sun was down, Joshua commanded that they should take his carcase down from the tree, and cast it at the entering of the gate of the city, and raise thereon a great heap of stones, that remaineth unto this day.

30 ¶ Then Joshua built an altar unto the Lord God of Israel in mount Ebal, 31 As Moses the servant of the Lord commanded the children of Israel, as it is written in the book of the law of Moses, an altar of whole stones, over which no man hath lifted up any iron; and they offered thereon burnt offerings unto the Lord, and sacrificed peace offerings.

32 ¶ And he wrote there upon the stones a copy of the law of Moses, which he wrote in the presence of the children of Israel.

33 And all Israel, and their elders, and officers, and their judges, stood on this side the ark and upon Acham, vii. 26, and for the same end, to be a monument of his being hanged near to this place.

If this mount lay between Ai and Beth-el (as Gerardus Mercator endeavours to prove by many arguments), then this altar, we may well think, was built immediately after the taking of Ai, as soon as they came into possession of this mount: for they looked upon themselves, no doubt, as obliged to fulfil the command of God, given them by Moses, as soon as it was possible. But the Scripture plainly describes this Mount Ebal as near Shechem, for there was only a valley between Ebal and Gerizim, from whence Jotham spake to the men of Shechem (Judg. ix. 7), which was a very great distance from Ai. And therefore we must suppose that which is here related not to have been done till they had the country about Shechem.

36 As is written in the book of the law] The altar was built according to the directions given by God in a foregoing law of his, Exod. xx. 25, and repeated in Deut. xxvii. 5, 6 (see them).

37 They offered thereon burnt offerings] For now they renewed their covenant with God the third time, as I observe upon that chapter in Deuteronomy, ver. 10.

38 Ver. 32] It is a great question what it was he wrote upon these stones. Some fancy all the five books of Moses; others only the book of Deuteronomy; which is more likely than the other; but too long for these stones to contain, or for him to write, “in the presence of all Israel.” Others, therefore, think only the ten commandments, or a compendium of the law of Moses; or, perhaps, the blessings and cursings: but Fortunatus Senecchus, with some probability, conjectures, that he only wrote the words of the covenant, by which the children of Israel acknowledged they held the land of Canaan of God, as their great Lord; upon condition they observed his laws, to which they and their posterity were obliged. And this he principally grounds upon those words (Deut. xxvii. 3), “Thou shalt write upon them all the words of this law.” Where the Hebrew word hazoth (this) he thinks hath a particular respect to what he is speaking of: viz. their going over Jordan to possess the land which God gave them, upon condition they observed his statutes (see Sacror. Elaeochrys. Myrothec. lib. ii. cap. 57, p. 570, &c. and my notes upon Deuteronomy, xxvii. 3).

39 Ver. 33. Stood on this side the ark, and on that side) With their faces towards the ark.

Before the priests the Levites.) Who were to pronounce the blessings and cursings prescribed by the law (see Deut. xxvii. 24).
CHAPTER IX.

1 The kings combine against Israel. 3 The Gibeonites by craft obtain a league. 16 For which they are condemned to perpetual bondage.

And it came to pass, when all the kings which were on this side Jordan, in the hills, and in the valleys, and in all the coasts of the great sea over against Lebanon, the Hittite, and the Amorite, the Canaanite, the Perizzite, the Hivite, and the Jebusite, heard thereof;

2 That they gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and with Israel, with one accord.

CHAP. IX.

Ver. 1. The great sea] By the great sea, is meant the Mediterranean; where those people, peculiarly called Canaanites, dwelt, as hath been observed. And the Amorites seem to have been the principal inhabitants of the hilly country, in the south of Judea (see on Deut. i. 7, 19, 20).

Over against Lebanon.] The LXX. and the Vulgar understand this, as if he spake of those that dwelt near Lebanon.

The Hittite, &c.] Thus they are reckoned up in Deut. xx. 17, where the Girgashites are omitted, as they are here (see an account of it in my notes upon that place; and on ch. xvi. of this book, ver. 10).

Heard thereof.] Of the taking of Jericho and Ai: for what is said, in the words immediately foregoing, concerning the Israelites meeting at Mount Ebal, is not inserted as a thing wherein these nations were concerned.

Ver. 2. They gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua.] They entered into a confederacy to oppose Joshua's farther progress in the conquest of their country. But they did not gather themselves to battle, till they heard what Gibeon had done.

With one accord.] The whole country were unanimous in that resolution; and thereupon rejected the summons which Joshua had sent them to surrender themselves and their cities to him.

3 And when the inhabitants of Gibeon heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai,

4 They did work wilily, and went and made as if they had been ambassadors, and took old sacks upon their asses, and wine bottles, old, and rent, and bound up;

5 And old shoes and clouted upon their feet, and old garments upon them; and all the bread of their provision was dry and mouldy.

Ver. 3. And when the inhabitants of Gibeon] Or, "But when," &c. Gibeon was a city in the mountainous country; for we read afterward of a high place at Gibeon.

Heard what Joshua had done unto Jericho and to Ai,] They being Hivites (ver. 7), had at the first rejected the offers of peace which Joshua sent them, as the rest of their nation (ver. 1) had done. But hearing that Joshua had taken Jericho and Ai, and destroyed all their inhabitants, they repented of that resolution; and consulted how they might, by some means or other, make their peace with the Israelites.

Ver. 4. They did work wilily.] It being too late to surrender their city to Joshua upon such terms, as he is supposed to have offered (for there was no mercy to be shown them, after they had stood out against the three proclamations, which the Jews say were made to them), they contrived how to put a falsity upon the Israelites, and by craft and cunning procure their favour (see my annotations on Deut. xx. 10, 11).

Went] They chose some from among them, who went in the name of the rest, towards the camp of Israel.

Made as if they had been ambassadors.] Pretending that they were sent upon an embassy to them, from a far country; as they affirmed, ver. 6.

Took old sacks] Wherein was their provision.
6 And they went to Joshua unto the camp at Gilgal, and said unto him, and to the men of Israel, We be come from a far country: now therefore make ye a league with us.

7 And the men of Israel said unto the Hivites, Peradventure ye dwell among us; and how shall we make a league with you?

8 And they said unto Joshua, We are thy servants. And Joshua said unto them, Who are ye? and from whence come ye?

9 And they said unto him from a very far country thy servants are come because of the name of the Lord thy God: for we have heard the fame of him, and all that he did in Egypt,

10 And all that he did to the two kings of the Amorites, that were beyond Jordan, to Sihon king of Heshbon, and to Og king of Bashan, which was at Ashtaroth.

11 Wherefore our elders and all the inhabitants of our country spake to us, saying, Take victuals with you for the journey, and go to meet them, and say unto them, We are your servants: therefore now make ye a league with us.

12 This our bread we took hot for our pro-

Wine bottles,—and bound up;) Where they were rent.

Ver. 5. Old shoes and clouted upon their feet,] As if they had been worn out, and patched up, with long travel.

Old garments upon them, &c.] It is observed by Arius Montanus, that nothing is said of the decay of their wine: which they pretended, it is likely, to have drank all up, in so long a journey. For it was not so easy to procure sour wine, as mouldy bread.

Ver. 6. They went to Joshua—and to the men of Israel.] They addressed themselves to him, as the head of the people; and he had his council about him: who, in all probability, are here called "the men of Israel." Though some conceive, that they had laid hold of every one they met withal, and besought them to aduit them to their friendship.

We be come from a far country?] To sue to you for your friendship.

Make ye a league with us.] As they might do with those that accepted the offers of peace, which they sent them (Deut. xx. 11), and therefore much more with those who came to seek to be at peace with them: and were not inhabitants of the land of Canaan, but came from a far country; which they gave as a reason, why they should make a league with them. And, indeed, they had been to blame, if they had denied their petition; as the Romans were, who, when they were grown great, refused to receive a remote nation into their protection (as Appian tells us), who by their ambassadors submitted themselves to their power, because they did not see they were likely to get any thing by them. Which Bodinus (in his book against Malsarenus De Caritatae Rerum) censureas a base action, and injurious to Almighty God, "as if (saith he) the majesty of ruling and administering justice, especially to miserable and ill-instructed people, were not the greatest gift of God; and the highest honour of which a man is capable in this world."

Ver. 7. The men of Israel?] This shows that "the men of Israel" before mentioned were not ordinary persons, but such as had authority to treat with ambassadors.

Unto the Hivites.] Unto those who came from Gibeon, who were really Hivites, as is expressly said, xl. 19.

Peradventure ye dwell among us.] Are some of the people of this land; which we are commanded to root out.

How shall we make a league with you?] Then it is utterly unlawful for us to do what you desire: for God hath often forbidden it (Exod. xxiii. 32, 33, xxxiv. 12—16. Deut. vii. 2, 3, &c. and other places).

Ver. 8. They said unto Joshua,] With whom alone they had a desire to treat.

We are thy servants.] This doth not signify that they were ready to yield themselves to be tributaries to the Israelites, or accept of any terms that should be imposed on them: but are only expressions of great humility and civility; acknowledging the Israelites to be superior in power and strength, and therefore desiring their protection in their liberties. Thus Abraham addressed himself to the travellers, whom he entertained as greater persons than himself (Gen. xviii. 3, 4). And Jacob calls himself and his household the servants of Esau (Gen. xxx. 20). And thus Batriedies understood their language here; who says the king of Gibeon wrote a letter to Joshua, wherein, he besought the Israelites for security from him; and presented him with great gifts, as Hottinger observes in his Spongma Orientale, cap. 8. p. 507.

Who are ye? and from whence come ye?] They being backward to name the country from whence they were sent, it begat a reasonable suspicion in Joshua that they were some of the people of Canaan. See Ver. 9. From a very far country! They still avoid giving a particular account of their country, but answer in general terms; in which commonly lies deceit.

Because of the name of the Lord thy God:] To divert him from pressing them to give a more satisfactory answer, they pretend religion had invited them to take this long journey: which they knew would procure them a favourable audience.

For we have heard the fame of him, &c.] Of his miraculous works, particularly those which he did to deliver them from the Egyptian slavery; which, as it is evident, were come to their knowledge: so it is very reasonable to believe such wonderful things were the motives that made them seek for the Israelites' friendship; they being wont upon, as Rahab was, to embrace their religion.

Ver. 10.] They say not a word of the drying up of Jordan, and of the taking of Jericho and Ai: but prudently conceal their knowledge of those things, because they would have it supposed the tides of those wonders could not yet be arrived at a country so far off as they pretended theirs to be.

Ver. 11. Wherefore our elders] The principal persons in their country: who were the rulers and governors of their country.

And all the inhabitants] With the unanimous consent of all the people.

Take victuals with you for the journey:] Made choice of us for this embassy; and ordered us to provide ourselves with necessaries for so long a journey.

Go to meet them:] To prevent the Israelites from entertaining any hostile intentions against them.

[This is your servant.] The Samaritan Chronicle saith, they had orders to tell Joshua that they would embrace the Jewish religion; and refuse nothing, great or small, that he should desire of them. And indeed one would think, by what they said before, that they had a sense of the God of Israel as superior to all other gods: and consequently were disposed to become worshippers of him. For which reason he was pleased to dispose things so, that by their wise vision out of our houses on the day we came forth to go unto you; but now, behold, it is dry, and it is moody:

13 And these bottles of wine, which we filled, were new; and, behold, they be rent: and these our garments and our shoes are become old by reason of the very long journey.

14 And the men took of their viuels, and asked not counsel at the mouth of the Lord.

15 And Joshua made peace with them, and made a league with them, to let them live: and the princes of the congregation sware unto them.

16 ¶ And it came to pass at the end of three days after they had made a league with them, that they heard that they were their neighbours, and that they dwelt among them.

17 And the children of Israel journeyed, and came unto their cities on the third day. Now their cities were Gibon, and Chepherihah, and Becoroth, and Kirjath-jearim.

18 And the children of Israel smote them not, because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel. And all the congregation murmured against the princes.

19 But all the princes said unto all the con-would have consulted him; and it is probable would have allowed them to make a league with the Gibeonites on such conditions as he directed.

Ver. 15. Joshua made peace with them.] Following the opinion of the princes; who took them to be what they pretended.

Made a league with them, to let them live.] Not merely to spare their lives (which, supposing them to belong to a far country, they had no warrant to take away), but to let them continue in the enjoyment of all they had. For to live, in Scripture, signifies to be happy; and there was no reason why the Lord should prevent him from happiness; but to protect them in their rights and liberties.

Swore unto them.] Ratified the league by a solemn oath: the violation of which in future times was severely punished (2 Sam. xxii. 6).

Ver. 16.] Speedy news being sent by the pretended ambassadors to Gibeon of their good success (as we may well think they were great rejoicings made there, as Artius Montanus supposes. To the report of which came to the Israelites three days after the league was concluded.

Ver. 17. The children of Israel journeyed.] Not the whole body of the people, but a party was sent to understand the truth.

 Came unto their cities on the third day.] On the third day after they began their march thither.

Now their cities were Gibeon, &c.] The capital city was Gibeon (called a royal city, x. 2), upon which the other three were dependents. The first three of which fell afterwards to the tribe of Benjamin (xviii. 25, 26), as the last was in the tribe of Judah (xv. 60).

Ver. 18. The children of Israel smote them not.] Though they were not such as they supposed, but Canaanites, who were under the curse of God; yet they did not destroy them, for the reason following.

Because the princes of the congregation had sworn unto them.] Some think their oath did not bind them, because it was made upon a false supposition, that the Gibeonites were no part of the seven nations of Canaan. But if this were true, as it is not (see Gros-tius, De Jure Belli et Pacis, lib. ii. cap. 15, sect. 4), the princes judged right, that it had been very scandalous, and would have highly dishonoured the name of God, by whom they had sworn, if they had broken their oath. By the keeping of which, the reverence which the Gibeonites had already to the Divine Majesty was very much increased; whereas it had been vile in all people's eyes, if the Israelites had not expressed this great regard unto it.

And all the congregation murmured] Or, "But all the congregation murmured," &c., because they were thereby deprived of the spoil of those cities.

Ver. 19. But all the princes said] Their unanimity in this opinion was of great moment to quiet the people's discontent.

We have sworn unto them by the Lord God of Israel.] Especially since they had engaged themselves, by a solemn oath, to their great and glorious Lord, who fought for them, and gave them all their victories (ver. 13, 14). For so the Targum here expounds these words, "We have sworn by the Word of the Lord God of Israel."

We may not touch them. That is, do them any hurt; which we cannot do without breaking our oath, and forfeiting his favour.

Ver. 20. We will even let them live.] As they had covenanted, ver. 15.

Lest wrath be upon us, because of the oath. Lest God be very angry with us for breaking our oath. Which Joshua, as St. Ambrose observes, religiously observed, Ne, dum alienam perfidiam arguit, suam fidamsolverat, "that he might not be guilty of so shameful a thing as to break his faith, whilst he restored their perniciousness" (Lib. iii. De Officiis, cap. 10).

Ver. 21. The princes said. But they added this. Let them live.] Though we let them live, because we must be as good as our word, which is the meaning of the last words of this verse (which must be joined with these), "as the princes had promised them."

But let them be hewers of wood and drawers of water.] Yet they shall not be equal to us in all privileges, but we will make them in some sort serviceable to us; in such employments as will save us a great deal of labour.

Into all the congregation.] They were not to be hewers of wood, and drawers of water, for every private man, but for the benefit of the whole congregation of Israel, who were bound to find wood and water for the service of God at the tabernacle. Which burden it was now resolved should be laid upon the Gibeonites; and thereby the children of Israel ceased of it, ver. 23, where they are said to be made "hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of the Lord." This was no breach of their oath, for they did not make them absolutely slaves; but only a sacred kind of servants (as Josephus calls them), being employed about the house of God, which was in itself honourable, and not base and contemptible. Some think they were afterward called Nethinims, which signifies persons given to God for his service: of whom we read in 1 Chron. ix. 2. Ezra viii. 20, and other places.

Ver. 22. Joshua called for them.] For the ambassadors with whom he had made a league.

Wherefore have ye beguiled us, &c.] Imposed upon our belief by a false story.

Ver. 23. And therefore ye are cursed.] Notwithstanding our oath, you must not quite escape that curse of God which hath long lain upon all the people of Canaan, part of which you are. For a servile state and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God.

24 And they answered Joshua, and said, Because it was certainly told thy servants, how that the Lord thy God commanded his servant Moses to give you all the land, and to destroy all the inhabitants of the land from before you, therefore we were sore afraid of our lives because of you, and have done this thing.

25 And now, behold, we are in thine hand: as it seemeth good and right unto thee to do unto us, so.

26 And so did he unto them, and delivered them out of the hand of the children of Israel, that they slew them not.

of any sort, to which they were reduced, was no small punishment (called here a curse), and so much the more grievous, because it was to be perpetual.

There shall none of you be freed from being bondmen.] None of them were to continue freemen, but have a servitude imposed upon them: not, indeed, such a one as made them entire slaves, but only condemned them to the laboursome employment which here follows.

And hewers of wood and drawers of water.] This is the limitation of their servitude; which did not extend to all things, but only to these and such like (it is probable); to hew stones, for instance, for the repARATION of the temple after it was built, and to carry them to those who were employed in that work.

Grotius hath well expressed their condition, Adjecti sunt personali culdum servituti; "they were addicted to certain personal servitude," whereas if they had dealt plainly and openly with the Israelites, they might have been admitted only to pay a certain tribute (Lib. ii. De Jure Belli et Pacis, cap. 13. sect. 4. n. 3).

Ver. 24.] They first give an answer unto Joshua's demand, Wherefore have ye beguiled us? Which was done to save themselves, if they could, by any shift, from that destruction which they believed God had decreed against all the inhabitants of their land; and they did not know how to evade it, but by this artifice; which, since it arose from some degree of faith, God suffered to take effect, that they might remain for ever among the Israelites, as an unquestionable witness of their miraculous conquest of the land of Canaan.

Ver. 25.] Here they humbly submit to the doom he had passed upon them, or to any other imposition he should think fit to load them withal.

Ver. 26.] But Joshua would take no farther advantage of their submission, but contented himself with this burden alone; which, by a public decree, he laid upon them. It appears by this, that some gentiles had mere goodness in them than many of the children of Israel; who would have destroyed these well-disposed people (if Joshua had not hindered) who were better believers, being struck with a greater fear of God's threatenings than themselves.

Ver. 27. Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water.] He passed this sentence into a law; that, from henceforth, they should be subject to this servitude; in which they served God faithfully even to the times of Nehemiah; who tells us great numbers of the Nethinims (who many great men make no doubt were of the posterity of these Gibeonites) returned from Babylon to rebuild Jerusalem and the temple (Neh. vii. 46, &c. 73).
27 And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the altar of the Lord, even unto this day, in the place which he should choose.

CHAPTER X.

1 Five kings war against Gideon. 6 Joshua rescueth it. 10 God fighteth against them with hailstones.

2 The sun and moon stand still at the word of Joshua. 16 The five kings are murred in a cave. 21 They are brought forth, 24 sorrowfully used, 26 and hanged. 28 Seven kings more are conquered. 43 Joshua returneth to Gilgal.

1 Now it came to pass, when Adoni-zedec king of Jerusalem had heard how Joshua had taken Ai, and had utterly destroyed it; as he had done to Jericho and her king, so he had done to Ai and her king; and how the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel, and were among them;

2 That they feared greatly, because Gibeon was a great city, as it was of the royal cities, and because it was greater than Ai, and all the men thereof were mighty.

CHAP. X.

Ver. 1. When Adoni-zedec king of Jerusalem Who seems to have been the most potent prince in Canaan, and carried in his name an honourable title, which he probably annexed to the kings of this place; who had been famous for doing justice. For, it is probable, that ever since Melchizedek, who was king of Salem (the same with Jerusalem), and truly king of righteousness, as his name signified, they affected this title, though they did not always answer their character: for this Adonizezec (whose name imports the law of righteousness) had none of the virtues that were in Melchizedek. It is probably thought that this city hold the name of Salem, which it had in Abraham's time, till the Israelites came into the land of Canaan; and then they called it Jerusalem, when they first took possession of it. Which they did not so fully, but that still the Jebusites dwelt there with the children of Benjamin (see Judg. i. 8, 21), who were so weak, that the Jebusites, in time, recovered it wholly to themselves, and expelled the Benjaminites; see Judg. xix. 10, where it is called Jebus, though the other name is also acknowledged; because the Israelites call it Jerusalem, while the Jebusites, having prevailed, called it Jebus. Therefore Adoni-zedeeck king of Jerusalem sent unto Hoham king of Hebron, and unto Pi-ram king of Jarmuth, and unto Japhia king of Lachish, and unto Debir king of Eglon, saying,

3 Wherefore Adoni-zedeeck king of Jerusalem had made peace at Jericho and Ai.

And were among them:] Joined in society with them, or came (as we now speak) into their interest. Ver. 2. That they feared greatly,] All his people thought themselves in great danger; they as well as their king having heard of the terrible execution Joshua had made at Jericho and Ai.

Because Gideon was a great city,] Having others depending on it.

As one of the royal cities,] The Vulgar Latin takes no notice of the particle capf (as); but smith it was a royal city. And, indeed, that particle doth not always denote likeness, but only the truth of the thing spoken of; as in Joseph. iv. and many other places of the New Testament, as well as the Old (John i. 14. Phil. ii. 7). But I think here it should be expressed, as we do in our translation; because Gideon was not a royal city, that is, had no king in it that we read of; but was, notwithstanding, equal to those cities that had kings, being governed by elders (ix. 11), who were persons of very great authority.

It was greater than Ai:] More populous.

All the men thereof were mighty.] The inhabitants were esteemed men of great value; which made their revolt to the Israelites the more considerable.

Ver. 3. All these cities afterward belonged to the tribe of Judah; as appears from the following part of this book.

Ver. 4. Help me.] He was the most active in the war, and seems to have been of greatest power; calling the other kings only as auxiliaries to him.

That we may smite Gideon.] He thought to discourage others from yielding, by making this city an example of their vengeance. For it hath made peace with Joshua] Forsaken the interest of their country, and gone over to our enemies.
Joshua.

9 Joshua therefore came unto them suddenly, and went up from Gilgal all night.

10 And the Lord discomfited them before Israel, and slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah.

11 And it came to pass, as they fled from before Israel, and were in the going down to Beth-horon, that the Lorn east down over stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died: they were more which died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.

12 ¶ Then spake Joshua to the Lord in the Slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon.] Near to the city, as the particle "at" signifies in many places; particularly in the second chapter of this book, where Rahab's house is said to be upon the wall (we translate it, near or adjoining to the wall), and v. 13. where Joshua is said to be bejericcho, near to that city, for he was not in it when the Captain of the Lord's host appeared to him (see Bochart's Hierozoic, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 50).

Chased them.] To Beth-horon.] To the place which was called by this name, when this book was written; for it is not so placed now; it being built after they were settled in Canaan by Sherah, daughter or grand-doughter of Ephraim: as we read in 1 Chron. vii. 24.

Smote them unto Azekah, and unto Makkedah.] Two cities afterward in the tribe of Judah (xv. 35. 41). For, in the great confusion wherein they were by the hailstones striking upon them (as it here follows), they fled backward and forward, as we speak, sometimes this way, sometimes the quite contrary (for Beth-horon lay northerly, and these other towns in the south), according as the hailstones, by the shifting of the wind, flew in their faces.

11. Beth-horon.] Which was seated on the side of a hill; and seems to have taken its name from the great thunder and lightning. And thus for there was no other storm here mentioned; for Beth-horon signifies as much, as the house or place of fury or anger.

The Lord east down great stones from heaven upon them.] The LXX. call them ἀργυρίων, χαλκίων, "hailstones of a vast bigness;" which some think were accompanied with thunder and lightning. And thus the ancient heathen say, that Hercules was assailed in his war against Albinus, &c. (see Vossius, lib. i. De Orig. et Progressu Idolol. cap. 36.) And that railing of stones is not a fable, but a real truth, see him also, lib. iii. cap. 12. Plutarch also, in the life of Timoleon, relates how a terrible storm in the face of the Carthaginian army, gave him a great victory over them, with a very few forces which he had to encounter them. They that desire to see more to this purpose may look into Huetius' Questiones Alnetanae, lib. ii. cap. 12. sect. 12.

Unto Azekah.] This storm meeting them at Beth-horon drove them back to Azekah, as I observed on the foregoing verse.

They died.] They upon whom the hailstones fell were killed by them.

There were more which died with hailstones, &c.] For they could not fly from the stones which came from heaven, as they did from the sword of Israel.

19. Then spake Joshua to the Lord.] This song, as the Hebrews call it (see Masius).

In the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites.] It is not certain at what time of the day he spake

Ver. 5. Therefore the five kings of the Amorites, the king of Jerusalem, &c.] It is certain that Hebron belonged to the Hittites; as Jerusalem did to the Jebusites. But the Amorites being the most powerful people in Canaan (as appears from Gen. xv. 16), had, it seems, brought them under their power, and set kings of their own nation over them. Whence it is, that the Gibeonites, who were originally Hivites (ix. 17), are said to be of the "remnant of the Amorites" (2 Sam. xxi. 2), because they were fallen under their power, when Joshua conquered their country.

Gathered themselves.] Had a general meeting, and sent out a summons to all their people, who were fit for war, to remove (as we speak) at the place they appointed.

Went up.] Though they lived in the high country, yet Jerusalem was still higher; where they seem to have all met, according to Adonizek's desire, ver. 4.

Encamped before Gibeon.] Laid siege to it.

Made war against it.] Began to assault it.

Ver. 6. The men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua.] Or, had sent, as soon as they had seen of their march towards them.

Slack not thy hand from thy servants.] They doubted not of his succour, because they were his servants who had put themselves under his protection; but begged it might be speedy, for fear they should be overpowered by such numerous forces as were coming against them.

Come up to us quickly, and save us.] They did not hope to be preserved without his help; nor unless it arrived quickly.

Ver. 7.] These last words are the explication of the former, as if he had said, "All the people of war, even all the mighty men of valour." For it is not likely he took along with him all the fighting men (some of which were necessary to guard the camp at Gilgal), but only the choicest of them; on whose valor he could most rely, and who could march most swiftly to the relief of their confederates.

Ver. 8. The Lord said unto Joshua.] Before he stirred a foot, he consulted the Divine Majesty about this expedition; who encouraged him to undertake it.

Fear them not: for I have delivered them into thine hand.] He promised him an entire victory; which emboldened him to fall upon them undauntedly.

Ver. 9.] Accordingly, Joshua made all the haste he could towards them, marching all night, that he might surprise them in their quarters (as I suppose he did) before they could draw out their army against him.

Ver. 10. The Lord discomfited them before Israel.] The suddenness of the attack, no doubt, put them into great confusion. And besides, God struck a terror into them, which made them seek for safety by flight, rather than fighting.

up, they and all their hosts, and encamped before Gibeon, and made war against it.

6 ¶ And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp at Gilgal, saying, Slack not thy hand from thy servants; come up to us quickly, and save us, and help us: for all the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the mountains are gathered together against us.

7 So Joshua ascended from Gilgal, he, and all the people of war with him, and all the mighty men of valour.

8 ¶ And the Lord said unto Joshua, Fear them not: for I have delivered them into thine hand; there shall not a man of them stand before thee.
CHAPTER X.

day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel, and he said in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon: and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon. 13 And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed, until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day. 14 And there was no day like that before it or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man: for the Lord fought for Israel.

what follows. Many think, when the sun was deciling; others, rather in the morning. For he marched all night to surprise them, and in all probability fell upon them by break of day; and having routed and chased them for some hours, and killed great numbers of them, and Joshua fell among their hailstones, concluded he should destroy them all, if he had but time enough before night came to favour their escape. Which made him pray that he might have light to continue his pursuit, and gain a complete victory over them.

In the sight of Israel.] It is a frivolous observation of Maimonides, that, because it is not said "in the sight of all Israel" (before whom Moses did his miracles), Joshua was inferior to him, even when God wrought this stupendous miracle at his request: for all Israel did not hear speak these words, but only some few; as many, perhaps, as were with

Elijah at Mount Carmel, when he brought fire down from heaven to consume his sacrifice. But there is no question that Israel signify all the army; who heard, or were told what he said. Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; 13. He desired it might stand immovable, in that part of the heavens where he saw it now shining upon Gibeon.

Thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon.] There were more Ajalons than one; and it is not certain which one he means; and Jonathan has indeed copied of Dan (xix. 42. Judg. i. 35), which was farthest from Gibeon; for we must suppose these two places to have been at some distance, otherwise Joshua could not have seen the sun and the moon both appear at the same time; as it is probable they were both now in his eye, when he spake these words. It is not fit to enter into such questions as these; in what sign the sun now is, whether the moon now wax or wane, increase or decrease, &c. They that can make, and are disposed to such inquiries, may consult Deucorrius. Ver. 13. The sun stood still, and the moon stayed.] Thus Callisthenes represents the sun as stopping the wheels of his chariot, to behold a chorus of nymphs; which so highly pleased him, that it made him prolong the day (ver. 181, 182, of his hymn to Diana):

"Ηλιος μαρ' Ηλιος καιρει βαρος, αλλα βερτα

Δεινον επιτηγη, τα δε φαινα μελιναινα.

Where Ezek. Spanheimus excellently notes, that what the poets only fancied might be, was really done in the days of Joshua; and wishes Groton had thrown some of the Jews, who make this only a poetical phrase to express a long summer's day; for the prophet Habakkuk represents it otherwise, and so do many of the Talmudic doctors. They that can consult Huettus also, in his Alcetan: Questiones (lib. ii.

cap. 13, sect. 57), will find enough to shame those who disbelieve that his history, when they read a great number of stories among the heathen, which show they thought it within the power of their gods to do such things. And, among other memorable things, he doth not forget the ancient tradition of the Egyptians, related by Herodotus (in his Enterpe, cap. 129), concerning the stupendous alteration of the course of the sun. And our Dr. Jackson hath observed, that the heathen people of those times did note this miraculus event, and deliver the tradition of it to their posterity: who, as men are wont to do, endeavour to assign some cause of it. And the poets in ages following ascribe it (with some additions) unto that unnatural murder which Atreus committed: at which the heavens blushed, and the sun stood still. For this bloody fact, if Statius mistake not, was in the time of the Theban war; and that is placed, by good chronol-ogers, about the time of Joshua's conquest of Canaan.

(see book i. upon the Creed, ch. 15). But in this he was deceived, for Atreus lived in the days of the Judges. Until the people had avenged themselves] Till they had gained a complete victory, and utterly destroyed their enemies.

Is not this written in the book of Jasher?] The Targum expounds it, "in the book of the law:" as if the meaning was, that there God had foretold what wonders he would do for his people. But from the marginal translation (which is, "the book of the upright, or of righteous men") others take it for a book whence was recorded the wonderful things done by or for the religious heroes. And there are some probable arguments that it was written in verse, to fix these things in the memory of the people. Groton is of this opinion: for we find mention of it nowhere ets but only in 2 Sam. i. 18, and there it is mentioned upon account of a song made upon the death of David.

"It should be recorded in this book, Which was not accounted sacred (being written by several hands and in several ages), and so not preserved with such care as this and the other canonical books were. As for their opinion who think this book contained the ancient annals of the Jews more largely than they are recorded in this and the following books, it hath no ground at all;

but is invented merely to frame an argument from tence, that Joshua was not the author of this book;

but that it was collected in aftertimes, out of this great Chronicle; by somebody who made an abridgment of it. But Du Pin hath well observed, that it is not said here the years of Joshua were related in the book of Jasher; but only that mention is made therein of the miracle by which the moon stood still.

So the sun stood still] There is no more mention of the moon; for it was the light of the sun that made the day.

In the midst of heaven.] This doth not necessarily signify that it stood still precisely at the meridien point; but that it appeared visibly to every eye, fixed in the same place where it was, when Joshua spake the foregoing words, to which he was moved, no doubt, by a Divine inspiration.

About a whole day.] It may be simply translated,

"a whole day;" the particle coph, as I observed before, signifying oftentimes nothing of similitude, but the very thing itself. Therefore I look upon Maimodes' explanation as ungrounded; who by kajon thamim ("as a whole day") understands only as the longest day in summer (More Nevochim, par. xi. cap.

35). Which was a poor business, it being now summer-time, when this miracle was wrought: and, as Lyra thinks, in the month of June.

Ver. 14. There was no day like that before it or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of man;"

That is, did at his desire (or rather command) such a
And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, unto the camp at Gilgal.

But these five kings fled, and hid themselves in a cave at Makkedah.

And it was told Joshua, saying, The five kings are found hid in a cave at Makkedah.

And Joshua said, Roll great stones upon the mouth of the cave, and set men by it to keep them:

And stay ye not, but pursue after your enemies, and smite the hindmost of them; suffer them not to enter into their cities: for the Lord your God hath delivered them into your hand.

And it came to pass, when Joshua and the children of Israel had made an end of slaying stupendous thing as this. Whereby he gave an evident demonstration, that he who did such wonders in Egypt, and at the Red Sea, and the river Jordan, had an absolute power not only over the elements (as we call them) and all inferior creatures, but over the heavenly bodies, the sun, moon, and stars, whom the heathen worshipped. They have strange love to cavilling, who would hence have it this book was not written by Joshua: when, if he wrote it in his old age, there were many days passed since this prodigy, as Huetius well observes in his Demonstr. Evang. p. 186. See various opinions about the length of the life of Sixtinus Amama's Anti-barbarus Biblius, lib. iii. p. 381, &c.

For the Lord fought for Israel.] By throwing stones from heaven upon their enemies; and giving the Israelites strength to pursue them; and stopping the sun's course, that they might not want light for their pursuit, and preserving them from the stones which fell upon their enemies, and not upon them, though mingled with them in the fight.

Joshua returned, unto the camp at Gilgal.] The LXX. in the common copies wholly omit this verse; because Joshua did not return to Gilgal, till he had done what follows. and then he speaks of his return, in the same words and syllables, ver. 42, but it is in the edition of Hierom. 1540, as my most learned friend Dr. Alix informs me; and the meaning of it here, therefore, is no more than this: that he was about to return till he heard where the five kings were: and that many of the enemies were still remaining.

Ver. 16. But these five kings mentioned ver. 3.

Pursue.] Escaped the sword of the Israelites by flight; being provided, perhaps, with swift beasts for that purpose; and taking some by-ways, separate from their scattered forces, so that the hailstones did not fall upon them.

Hid themselves in a cave.] Which they knew to have secret lurking-places in it; where they could not be easily discovered.

At Makkedah.] In the confines of that city. Which not being yet taken, Joshua could not command great stones to be rolled upon the mouth of the cave, if it had been in the city itself.

Ver. 17.] It is likely Joshua had given a particular charge about them; and they made no inquiry what was become of them, till it was discovered, that they were in this place.

Ver. 18.] Told the stones to hinder their coming out.

Set men by it.] He ordered a guard also, to see that none removed the stones.

Ver. 19. Stay ye not, but pursue after your enemies.] They that brought this intelligence, were, it is likely, some officers in the army; whom he would not have to stop their pursuit of the scattered Canaanites, by looking after these kings; but leave it to others to take care to keep them safe shut up in the cave.

Smite the hindmost.] He means all that they could overtake in their flight.

And suffer them not to enter into their cities. And hinder the rest from retreating into their own cities; by which means they would not remain in a body together; but dispersed here and there, where they could save themselves.

God hath delivered them into your hand.] Given you an opportunity to complete their destruction.

Ver. 20. When Joshua and the children of Israel.] The children of Israel, by the command and direction of Joshua, who sent out strong parties to pursue them; but himself seems to have gone to lay siege to Makkedah.

Till they were consumed.] Till there was none of them to be seen in a body together.

The rest—entered into fenced cities. Those few that escaped got into such fortified cities as they could reach.

Ver. 21. All the people. Who had been sent out, and engaged in pursuit of the enemy.

Returned to the camp at Joshua at Makkedah.] Where, no doubt, he had ordered a general rendezvous, as we now speak, of the whole army that had been employed in this war.

Ver. 22.] The LXX. translate it υἱῶν, "sound and safe," and the Vulgar, sunt et integro numero: "sound and without the loss of a man." Which is to be understood of that detachment sent to pursue them (ver. 19), who came all safe to the camp, and not a man of them lost, or so much as wounded.

None moved his tongue.] There was not so much as a dog that barked at them. For that word dog is to be supplied (as Bochartius thinks), according to what we read, Exod. xi. 7 (see Hierozoicon, par. i. lib. ii. cap. 55). It is an expression of the great tranquillity wherein they were, and of an entire victory, there being not so much as a dog left to disturb them.

Ver. 23.] The wisdom of Joshua is here observed by Arius Montanus, who would not do this execution till all the people were returned to the camp to be witnesses of it. And he might have added, that he executed them before he assaulted Makkedah, that the inhabitants of that city might see there was no hope of any succour from those kings who had been very powerful.

Ver. 24.] They are named in the same order as in ver. 3, according to their rank and the line next to the king of Jerusalem, who was the chief; the king of Hebron seems to have been of greatest note; and so of the rest. The same Montanus thinks it probable, that as they brought them forth and set them before Joshua, they said, This is the king of Jerusalem; and then, This is the king of Hebron, &c. out those kings unto Joshua, that Joshua called for all the men of Israel, and said unto the captains of the men of war which went with him, Come near, put your feet upon the necks of these kings. And they came near, and put their feet upon the necks of them.

25 And Joshua said unto them, Fear not, nor be dismayed; be strong and of good courage: for thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies against whom ye fight.

26 And afterward Joshua smote them, and slew them, and hanged them on five trees: and they were hanging upon the trees until the evening.

27 And it came to pass at the time of the going down of the sun, that Joshua commanded, and they took them down off the trees, and cast them into the cave wherein they had been hid, and laid great stones in the cave's mouth, which remain until this very day.

Ver. 24. All the men of Israel. That is, all the men of war.

Ver. 25. Put your feet upon the necks of these kings. Who lay bound, I suppose, prostate upon the ground.

Ver. 26. Hanged them on five trees. As a mark of infamy, whereby a terror was struck into all others.

Ver. 27. Thus shall the Lord do to all your enemies. To all the inhabitants of Canaan.

Ver. 26. Afterward Joshua smote them. After they had trampled upon them he ordered them to be killed.

Ver. 27. Hanged them on five trees. As a mark of infamy, whereby a terror was struck into all others.

Ver. 28. That day Joshua took Makkedah. The same day the king of it was hanged; and it seems to be probable it was on that long day (as I said before) which God made on purpose that they might do all the great things before mentioned, and what follows, before the night came upon them. Then their bodies were taken down, not in honour to them, but in honour to the land of Israel, where God now dwelt. So Aben Ezra.

Ver. 28. Which day Joshua took Makkedah, the same day the king of it was hanged; and it seems to be probable it was on that long day (as I said before) which God made that they might complete their conquest of these kings; and when they had done, take this city also. Our great primate of Ireland indeed, by that day, understands the same day that he set down before the city; which he thinks was some time after what is before related.

Ver. 29. And that day Joshua took Makkedah, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof he utterly destroyed, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain: and he did to the king of Makkedah as he did unto the king of Jericho.

Ver. 30. And the Lord delivered it also, and the king thereof, into the hand of Israel; and he smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein; he let none remain in it; but did unto the king thereof as he did unto the king of Jericho.

Ver. 31. And Joshua passed from Makkedah, and all Israel with him, unto Libnah, and encamped against it, and fought against it.

Ver. 32. And the Lord delivered Lachish into the hand of Israel, which took it on the second day, slain among the rest, and not taken alive as the king of Ai was.

Ver. 33. All the men of war. That is, all the fighting men, together with the women and children; because they had refused the offers of peace, sent them from Joshua, before he invaded their land.

Ver. 34. The Lord delivered it also. They made an easy conquest of it, because God gave it up into their hand.

Ver. 35. And Egypt. The same words whereby the destruction of Makkedah is described, ver. 28. For both these cities favoured the five kings before mentioned, and therefore (as Conradus Pellicanus thinks) were destroyed utterly, not only by the command of God, but by the right of war. But the command of God, was the only ground, as it is expressed, ver. 40.

Ver. 36. Joshua passed from Libnah, unto Lachish. Another city which fell to the tribe of Judah, in the division of the land (xxv. 42), and was one of the cities given to the priests (xxii. 13. 1 Chron. vi. 57).

Ver. 37. Fought against Libnah. Laid siege to it, and planted their batteries against it.

Ver. 38. And this day. The Lord delivered it also; They made an easy conquest of it, because God gave it up into their hand.

Ver. 39. And the Lord delivered it. They made an easy conquest of it, because God gave it up into their hand.

Ver. 40. Encamped against it. This, it seems, was a stronger city than either of the former; for there is no mention of an encampment against them before they began their assault.

Ver. 41. The Lord delivered Lachish. He doth not add, and the king thereof, as he doth of Makkedah and Libnah, (ver. 28, 30), because he was one of the five kings which he had lately hanged, and they had not, it is likely, set a new one on his throne (ver. 23).

Ver. 42. Which took it on the second day. After they began the siege; or, the second day after the taking of Makkedah and Libnah. The former is most likely, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein, according to all that he had done to Libnah.

33 ¶ Then Horam king of Gezer came up to help Lachish; and Joshua smote him and his people, until he had left him none remaining.

34 ¶ And from Lachish Joshua passed unto Eglon, and all Israel with him; and they encamped against it, and fought against it:

35 And they took it on that day, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and all the souls that were therein he utterly destroyed that day, according to all that he had done to Lachish.

36 And Joshua went up from Eglon, and all Israel with him, unto Hebron; and they fought against it:

37 And they took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof, and all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining, according to all that he had done to Eglon; but destroyed it utterly, and all the souls that were therein.

38 ¶ And Joshua returned, and all Israel with him, to Debir; and fought against it:

39 And he took it, and the king thereof, and all the cities thereof; and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and utterly destroyed all the souls that were therein; he left none remaining: as he had done to Hebron, so he did to Debir, and to the king thereof; as he had done also to Libnah, and to her king.

40 ¶ So Joshua smote all the country of the hills, and of the south, and of the vale, and of the springs, and all their kings: he left none remaining, but utterly destroyed all that breathed, as the Lord God of Israel commanded.

41 And Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea even unto Gaza, and all the country of Goshen, even unto Gibeon.

because their encampment against it signifies they spent some time before it.

Smote it with the edge of the sword, &c.] These words, and the following, are the very same with what he said before of the two forenamed cities; only he doth not add, “he let none remain,” which is to be supposed.

Ver. 33. Then Horam king of Gezer This was a city afterward in the tribe of Ephraim (xvi. 10), belonging to the Levites (xxi. 21), and not far from Gibeon, as may be guessed from 1 Chron. xiv. 16.

Joshua smote him and his people; If he destroyed his city at this time, he returned to Lachish. And it is probable, he sent forth a detachment to fight Horam and his army; who having routed them, destroyed also their city, and then went on with the siege of Lachish.

Ver. 34. Joshua passed unto Eglon.] Which also belonged afterward to Judah (xv. 39), and seems to have been as considerable as Lachish; for it follows, that “they encamped against it, and fought against it,” as they had done against the other. Their king was one of the five who were killed and hanged before (ver. 29).

Ver. 35. They took it on that day.] The same day they set down before it; for none came to their relief, as Horam did to help Lachish, which may be one reason that city was not taken till the second day (ver. 22).

Smote it The same he had said of the forenamed cities; only he saith, “he utterly destroyed all” that were therein on the same day, which is the same with those words, “he let none remain.”

Ver. 36.] This was also a city of Judah (as every one knows, xv. 51), and was seated in the mountainous country, as the former were in the plain, which is the reason he is said to go up to it from Eglon.

Ver. 37. And the king] Their king was one of the five whom Joshua had lately killed and hanged. But it seems, they had set up a new one, being a city of great note, which had other cities depending on it, as it follows in the next words.

All the cities thereof It was not only one of the royal cities, which had other cities subject to it (as Gibeon had, which was a kind of royal city) but of very great power. For these words import, as if there were many cities under its jurisdiction.

All the souls that were therein In this conquest, Caleb was very instrumental, and signalized himself (as we now speak) by driving out the three sons of Anak (xv. 13, 14), who were slain there (Judg. i. 10). Thus we must understand this history; or else say, as some do, either that Joshua only took the city and destroyed it, but could not take the citadel or strong fort, on the top of the mountain (which doth not seem to be exactly true, for we read in the next chapter, ver. 21, 22, that he cut off the Anakims from the mountains, &c.), or that, after he had destroyed it, as is here related, the Anakims came from Gaza, and other cities of the Philistines, whither they now fled, and peopled it again, but were expelled and slain by Caleb, as some understand, xiv. 12. (see Judg. i. 10).

Ver. 38.] He had not been there before, but having gone as far south and west as he thought fit, (even as far as Gaza, which was in the western coast, ver. 41), he turned his course towards the camp at Gilgal, which was now north-east from him and in his way thither took Debir, which also was a city of Judah (xv. 49), and one of the cities of the priests (xxxi. 15. 1 Chron. vi. 58), called also Kiriaith-Sepher, and Kiriaith-Sanna.

Ver. 39.] It was a great city (we may gather from hence, like to Hebron), in the conquest of which Othniel the brother of Caleb did great service, and therefore it was given to him, as we read, xv. 15—17, and Judg. i. 17.

Ver. 40. Joshua smote all the country of the hills, &c.] He forbears to name all the cities he took, and, in short, saith he subdued the whole country that lay south and west (as it is explained in the next verse), of whatsoever sort it was; both the hilly and the low country: for they that describe countries are wont to have respect to two things: the condition and quality of the soil, and then the situation: the first of these he expresses in this verse, and the other in the next. For here he describes it as partly hilly and dry, and partly plain and full of springs.

Utterly destroyed all that breathed.] Which must be restrained to mankind; for they kept their cattle as a prey to themselves.

As the Lord God of Israel commanded.] This is added as a justification of the Israelites, from all imputation of cruelty or severity; for they only executed a Divine sentence against this people for their abominable wickedness (Lev. xviii. 21, 24, &c.) wherewith the Israelites would have been in danger to be infected, if they had not been extirpated.

Ver. 41. Joshua smote them from Kadesh-barnea}
CHAPTER XI.

1 Divers kings overcome at the waters of Merom. 10 Hazor is taken and burnt. 16 All the country taken by Joshua. 21 The Anakims cut off.

1 And it came to pass, when Jabin king of Hazor had heard those things, that he sent to Jobab king of Madon, and to the king of Shimron, and to the king of Achshaph,

2 And to the kings that were on the north of the mountains, and of the plains south of Chinneroth, and in the valley, and in the borders of Dor on the west,

3 And to the Canaanite on the east and on the west, and to the Amorite, and the Hittite, and

Of the plains south of Chinneroth.] In the flat country, which lay south of the lake called afterward Gennesaret, now Chinnereth (see Numb. xxxiv. 11).

In the valley.] Some conjecture he means that pleasant valley between Mount Hermon and Mount Gilboa, called the valley of Jezreel.

Dor] A city, with a country belonging to it, in the tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11).

On the west.] Upon the midland sea. Where Josephus mentions (in his second book against Appion) a city called Dora, near Mount Carmel (see Bochartus in his Canaan, lib. 1. cap. 41. p. 752).

Ver. 3. To the Canaanite] The people peculiarly so called.

On the east and on the west.] It hath been noted before, that some of this people lived on the east near Jordan; and others of them on the west, near the midland sea (see Numb. xiii. 29).

The Amorite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite.] There were other Amorites scattered up and down the country, besides those who were subject to the five kings mentioned in the foregoing chapter, ver. 5, who were all now assembled together by Jabin, with the rest of the Hittites and Perizzites (who were in several parts of the country), that they might make as powerful an army as could be raised.

The Jebusite in the mountains.] About Jerusalem, where they kept a strong hold till the time of David; the Perizzite, and the Jebusite in the mountains, and to the Hivite under Hermon in the land of Mizpeh.

4 And they went out, and all their hosts with them, much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea shore in multitude, with horses and chariots very many.

5 And when all these kings were met together, they came and pitched together at the waters of Merom, to fight against Israel.

As the Perizzites lived in other mountainous and woody countries, as Bochartus observes.

To the Hivite under Hermon] This was a mountain in the north-east part of the country, where some Hivites were settled, as others were about Gilboa. That Hermon was easterly, appears from Ps. lxxxix. 12, whence it is that the Hivites are called Kadmonites, that is, easterlings (Gen. xv. 19) as Bochart hath observed in his Pialeg. lib. iv. cap. 36, and in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 19.

In the land of Mizpeh.] There were several cities of this name; one in the tribe of Judah (xxv. 38), another belonging to Benjamin (xvii. 26), and two more beyond Jordan in the land of Gilead; one in the tribe of Gad, the other in the tribe of Manasseh, or very near it; which gave name to the country about it, and seems to be here intended.

Ver. 4. They went out.] The kings of all these people.

Much people, even as the sand that is upon the sea shore in multitude.] A vast army, which could not easily be numbered; or, which covered the place where they were encamped, as sand doth the seashore; so that nothing could be seen but armed men, horses, and chariots, &c. It is a proverbial speech in Scripture for vast numbers of men, or great quantities of corn: or exceeding much knowledge and wisdom, as every one knows.

With horses and chariots very many.] This made them the more formidable, because the Israelites were all footmen: who might easily be beaten by a strong body of horse; especially when they had chariots also, which carried men in them (see upon Deut. xxv. 1), and they had greater numbers also of them, as these words intimate. Josephus makes their chariots alone to have been twenty thousand. The land of Canaan, indeed, did not breed horses (as I have often observed), but they might easily procure them out of Egypt, and they trusted much to this kind of forces, wherein the Egyptians excelled most people (see Deut. xviii. 16).

Ver. 5. When all these kings were met together.] In some place which the king of Hazor appointed for a general rendezvous. For though this multitude were of different nations, yet they all now combined against the Israelites. But it was a great providence of God, that as all this country was not united under one head, but divided into several petty kingdoms; so they did not all enter into a confederacy at the first against Joshua, but fought severally; only five of their kings joining together. Though now they seem to have seen their error; and therefore all that remained, joined, as one man, to oppose Joshua's farther proceeding.

They came and pitched together at the waters of Merom.] They marched to these waters, and there formed a camp, to prepare, and set themselves in order, to give Israel battle. These waters, all agree, were that lake which Josephus calls Σαμαχωνία, from the abundance of fishes that were in it: for Samacon, or Semechon, in the Arabic language, signifies a fish (as Bochart observes in his Hierozoicen, par. i. lib. i. cap. 6), and Joshua here calls the "waters of Merom;" that is, the upper waters; for this lake was near the fountain of Jordan, which ran through the lake of Tiberias, and fell into the lake Asphaltites, or the Dead Sea. With respect to which waters, these were called the upper, they being lower. And here they pitched rather than any other place, being under the jurisdiction of Jabin, who had called them together for Hazor, where he reigned, was situate upon this lake, as Josephus tells us, lib. v. Antiq. cap. 6.

Ver. 6. The Lord said unto Joshua.] Who went, it is probable (as he had done formerly, x. 8), to consult the Divine Majesty, how he should manage himself upon this great occasion.

Be not afraid because of them.] Some collect from hence (even Josephus himself,) that Joshua was possessed with some fear, when he heard of such a numerous army, and so well appointed, coming against him. But I do not think it at all probable, that after so many late assurances and signal demonstrations, as God had given him of his presence with him in this war, he should be capable of this passion (see the first chapter of this book, ver. 2, 3, 6, 7, 9, liv. 7, 9, 10, v. 12—15, x. 8). Therefore these words were spoken to him, that he might animate the people, whose hearts were apt to fail them, when they saw such terrible enemies.

To-morrow about this time.] It is not certain what this time was; but it is likely in the morning after he had marched all night (as he did against the five kings, xii. 9), that he might fall upon them unexpectedly.

Will I deliver them up all slain before Israel.] The LXX. translate it τηρανοικοις, "put to flight." Which agrees with what follows; for it is certain they were not all slain, but many of them fled, and the Israelites pursued them: and therefore other copies of the LXX. have it τηρανοικοις, "wounded," so broken and shattered, that they were all in effect dead men. Hence their horses,] Cut their hamestrings, and thereby render them unfit for future service.

Burn their chariots.] That they might be no more used; no, not by the Israelites themselves.

Ver. 7. Joshua came—against them.] He did not wait for their motion; but attacked them as they lay in their quarters; for that is signified by the next word.

Suddenly.] When they thought not of an enemy near them; but were consulting, perhaps, how to manage the war against the Israelites. They fell upon them.] When they were unprovided to make such resistance as they would have done, if they had been ready to receive them.

Ver. 8. The Lord delivered them into the hand of Israel, who smote them.] Route and killed a great many of them.

Chased them unto great Zidon.] This, it seems, was a large city, and of great note in these days (for there great Zidon, and unto Misrephoth-maim, and unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward; and they smote them, until they left them none remaining.

9 And Joshua did unto them as the Lord bade him; he houghed their horses, and burnt their chariots with fire.

10 ¶ And Joshua at that time turned back, and took Hazor, and smote the king thereof with the sword; for Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms.

11 And they smote all the souls that were therein with the edge of the sword, utterly destroying them; there was not any left to breathe: and he burnt Hazor with fire.

12 And all the cities of those kings, and all was no Zidon the less), built by the eldest son of Canaan (as Josephus thinks), from whom it had its name (see Gen. x. 15). It lay in the north-west part of Canaan, upon the sea.

Unto Misrephoth-maim.] It is thought by some that this was a place where there were hot waters, which I shall not examine, but only note it as a probable conjecture, from xiii. 6, that it was a place in the country of Zidon where they made salt.

Unto the valley of Mizpeh eastward.] See ver. 3. This signifies, that they pursued some of them westward to Zidon and Misrephoth-maim, and those eastward towards Mizpeh.

Smote them, until they left them none remaining.] As they divided themselves, and fled several ways; so did the Israelites send out several parties, both to the west and to the east, who pursued them so close, that they left not a man of them escape.

Ver. 9.] We do not read, as Kimchi notes upon this place, of any horses or chariots which the five kings, mentioned in the foregoing chapter, brought into the field; because they were only to besiege Gibeon, and hoped to take it presently by an assault, in which there was no use of horses and chariots; which they did not want, no more than these kings, who abounded in them, and placed their principal confidence in their horsemen and chariots. Which was the reason God commanded them to hough their horses; that is, to cut their nerves and sinews in their hams, which Josephus translates ἴπτετος πονηρ., "to make them useless and unprofitable!" for God would not have his people place their safety and security in this, but in himself alone, as good people always did (Ps. xx. 7). Accordingly, when David had conquered Haddedezar, and taken from him a great number of horses and chariots, he disabled all the horses, after this example of Joshua (as if God intended by him to teach all future rulers of his people what to do), reserving only as many as would serve for a hundred chariots (2 Sam. viii. 4). And Schickardus observes, out of the Jewish authors, that they were wont thus to enervate all the horses they found in the king's stables after his death, that they might not be of use to his successor (see his Mischpat Hamelech, cap. 6. Theor. 19, and Bochart's Hierozoicon, par. 1. lib. ii. cap. 11).

Ver. 10. Joshua at that time.] Before he thought of returning to his camp, at Gilgal. Turned back.] From pursuing those that fled towards the western coast.

Tack Hazor.] Which was in the eastern part of the country, upon the lake before mentioned.

Smote the king thereon.] This was one reason, it is likely, why he made haste to invest Hazor; because the king thereof, who was the chief author of this the kings of them, did Joshua take, and smote them with the edge of the sword, and he utterly destroyed them, as Moses the servant of the Lord commanded.

13 But as for the cities that stood still in their strength, Israel burned none of them, save Hazor only; that did Joshua burn.

14 And all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle, the children of Israel took for a prey unto themselves; but every man they smote with the edge of the sword, until they had destroyed them, neither left they any to breathe.

15 ¶ As the Lord commanded Moses his servant, so did Moses command Joshua, and so did Joshua; he left nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded Moses.

war, had escaped out of the battle, and thought to defend himself there.

For Hazor beforetime was the head of all those kingdoms.] Not of all the kingdoms of Canaan; but of all those mentioned in the beginning of this chapter. Which was another reason why he fell upon it at this time, that by taking the most considerable city of this part of Canaan, all the rest might be disheartened to hold out against him.

Ver. 11. The cities of which the kings of them, did Joshua take.] viz. Those mentioned ver. 2, 3, whom Jabin drew into confederacy with him; and perhaps were his dependants.

Utterly destroyed them.] That is, all their inhabitants.

As Moses commanded.] Deut. vii. 2, and many other places.

Ver. 13. As for the cities that stood still in their strength.] The Hebrew words all thilhim (which we translate "in their strength"), literally signify on their heap, as is noted in the margin of our Bibles; that is, were seated in an eminent place, and therefore of greater strength than those that stood in the plain. Thus Bochart interprets it in his Canaan, lib. i. cap. 29, from whence he thinks came the names of Thela-sar (and Kings xi. 8), and Tmol-sheth (Ezek. iii. 15.) And thus I observe the prophet Jeremiah speaks, xxx. 18, Jerusalem shall be built on her own heap, or high hill. But the meaning may be, according to our translation, the cities whose walls were not battered down in the taking of them.

Israel burned none of them.] Because they intended to dwell in them; and would not be at the charge and pains of building new walls for their safety.

Save Hazor only.] Because it was the capital city and began this war against them: which being laid desolate by the Israelites, without inhabitant, the Canaanites took their opportunity to rebuild it, and settle themselves there again.

Ver. 11. All the spoil—the children of Israel took.] As the Lord alleged them to do at Ai (viii. 2).

But every man they smote, &c.] Because God had often commanded these nations should be rooted out for their abominable wickedness; lest the Israelites should be drawn in to imitate them in their filthy lewdness, as I observed from Lev. xviii. 24—26, &c. See also xx. 23, 23, &c.

Ver. 15. As the Lord commanded Moses.] See Exod. xxxiv. 11, 12, &c.

He left nothing undone of all that the Lord commanded Moses.] Which is a demonstration that Moses left in writing what we read the Lord commanded in the foregoing books, and that they were not written (as some pretend) in later times: for then it would have been impossible for Joshua to have executed every thing that he commanded, unless he had had the book of the law before him for his direction. But so desirous are some men to weaken the authority of these holy books, that from hence they argue this book of Joshua could not be written by himself, but some other; because he gives himself this high commendation. So the author of Theolog. Polit., who on the same reason might have rejected St. Paul's Epistles as none of his, and Cæsar's Commentaries; for both of them relate their own virtues, and the noble things they did.

Ver. 16. Joshua took all that land.] Belonging to the kings before mentioned.

The hills, &c.] This is a description of his whole conquest, as appears from x. 40.

The mountain of Israel.] It is very uncertain what place this was, but many think it probable to be Beth-el: where God appeared to Jacob, as he went to Padan-Aram, and promised to give him this land (Gen. xxviii. 12, 13), and where he dwelt, by God's direction, after he came from Padan-Aram, and God appeared again to him there, and made him the same promise, and changed his name from Jacob to Israel (Gen. xxxv. 1, 9, 10, &c.).

The valley of the same.] Belonging to the same mountain. But Conr. Pellicanus thinks the singular number is put for the plural, and thus explains the whole verse: The land of Israel was partly in the hill-country, partly in the south towards Egypt, partly in the plain near the great sea, and the sea of Sodom, and the spring of Jordan, near Tabor, in Galilee. And moreover, the mountains of Israel were the two Carmels, Hermon, Gilead, Lebanon, those about Jerusalem, and many other.

Ver. 17. Even from the mount Halak.] Or the stone mountain, as Bochart interprets it, lib. i. Camaan, cap. 5.

[That goeth up to Seir.] Which was the bounds of the country of Edom.

Even unto Boa-ad.] As in the foregoing words, he expresses the bounds of Joshua's conquest southward, so hither they reached northward. And this seems to be a description of the length of the country which he took from the king of Hazor, and all those that joined with him, as Archbishop Usher understands it.

[All their kings he took, and smote them.] So that none appeared to make head against him.

Ver. 18.] But those kings were so many, and made such great opposition, that he spent six years (as the forenamed great person computes) in this war before he could finish it.

Ver. 19. There was not a city that made peace with the children of Israel.] This is the reason the war continued so long, because there was but one city that surrendered on such terms as had been offered them; but all the rest obstinately refused to yield unto Joshua.

Save only the Hivites.] See viii. 3. Who, if they had truly discovered who they were (which out of fear they concealed), and begged peace, they might have obtained it on such conditions as were proposed to all.

All other they took in battle.] By force of arms.

Ver. 20. For it was of the Lord to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel.] Being a people obstinately wicked, God ordered things so in his providences, that they were emboldened (notwithstanding the wonders they had certainly heard were done for Israel) to fight with them. By which it appears the Gibeonites were a better sort of people, who considered what God had done in favour of the Israelites.

That they might have no favour.] Which they might have found, if they had not been so fool-hardy (as we speak), as to imagine they could withstand those before whom the river Jordan fled, and the walls of Jericho fell down flat.

As the Lord commanded Moses.] In many places, particularly in Deut. vii. 2. xx. 16, 17.

Ver. 21. At that time.] That is, in the war before mentioned, and perhaps in the conclusion of it; after they had done none to oppose him in other places, but only in those mountainous countries which were of difficult access.

Came Joshua.] Either from the camp at Gilgal, or from destroying the kings and their countries, of which he had been speaking in this chapter.

Cut off the Anakims.] Who were a distinct people (Arius Montanus thinks) from the Canaanites; of a fierce, cruel, and tyrannical disposition, who oppressed all their neighbours.

From the mountains.] Where they had settled, and it is likely, strongly fortified themselves; which moved Joshua to let them alone till he had finished his other conquests. Concerning these Anakims, see Numb. xiii. 22. 23.

From Hebron.] Called also Kiriath-Arba, the city of Arba, who was a great man among the Anakims (see Boehartus, in his Camaan, lib. i. cap. 1. p. 269).

Debir.] Also Kiriath-Sepher, as I noted before.

Arab.] This, as well as the two foregoing names, fell to the tribe of Judah (xv. 50).

All the mountains of Judah.] All the mountainous country which afterward fell by lot to that tribe.

All the mountains of Israel.] All the mountainous country which was in the rest of the tribes of Israel, where these people, it is likely, fled for safety.

Joshua destroyed them utterly with their cities.
CHAPTER XII.

The two kings whose countries Moses took and disposed of.

1 Now these are the kings of the land, which the children of Israel smote, and possessed their land on the other side Jordan toward the rising of the sun, from the river Arnon unto Mount Horæmon, and all the plain on the east:

2 Sihon king of the Amorites, who dwelt in Heshbon, and ruled from Arer, which is upon the bank of the river Arnon, and from the middle of the river, and from half Gilead, even unto the river Jabbok, which is the border of the children of Ammon;

3 And from the plain to the sea of Chinneroth on the east, and unto the sea of the plain, even the salt sea on the east, the way to Beth-jeshimoth; and from the south, under Ashdoth-pisgah:

4 And the coast of Og king of Bashan, which was of the remnant of the giants, that dwelt at Ashtaroth and Edrei, Gilead:" there being nothing to answer to the word from: which being left out, the sense is plain, that half of the country of Gilead belonged to Sihon, as the other half did to Og (ver. 5). Unto the river Jabbok,] Thus his country is constantly described; particularly in Numb. xxi. 24. Deut. iii. 16. Ver. 3. From the plain, &c.] There is nothing answering to the word from; in the Hebrew; which may most clearly be translated and the plain: and so the LXX. only retaining the word Araba, which we translate plain. This was another part of Sihon's country, a great plain, which lay eastward of the sea of Cineroth, and the salt sea; by which it was bounded on the west. The way to Beth-jeshimoth.] Which, by the next words, is thought to have lain towards the south. From the south, under Ashdoth-pisgah:] The meaning seems to be, that on the south it was bounded by Ashdoth-pisgah (see Deut. iii. 17). I do but touch these things, leaving them to a very learned friend and brother of mine, who hath most accurately considered every part and place of this country. Ver. 4. The coast of Og king of Bashan.] The next 5 And reigned in mount Hermon, and in Selah, and in all Bashan, unto the border of the Gezurites and the Maschathites, and half Gilead, the border of Sihon king of Heshbon.

6 Then did Moses the servant of the Lord and the children of Israel smite: and Moses the servant of the Lord gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseth.

7 ¶ And these are the kings of the country which Joshua and the children of Israel smote:
and Moses the servant of the Lord gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseth.

8 In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains, and in the springs, and in the wilderness, and in the south country; the Hittites, the conquest they made was of the kingdom of Og, who was of the remnant of the giants (see Deut. iii. 11).

That dwelt at Ashtaroth and at Edrei.] See Deut. i.
4. Some would gather from this place, and from xiii. 12, that he had two royal seats, one at Ashtaroth another at Edrei; and he lived sometimes in the one, and sometimes in the other.

Ver. 5. Reigned in mount Hermon.] At the bottom of which some other people lived, who were conquered by Joshua (xi. 17).

In Selaah.] This was one of his cities in that part of his kingdom which was next to Hermon, as some conjecture from xiii. 12. But others think it was in the southern part of this country, possessed afterward by the Gadites; which they gather from 1 Chron. v.
11, 12, 16.

All Bashan, unto the border, &c.] See an account of this, and of all that follows in this verse, Deut. iii.
13, 14.

Ver. 6. Them did Moses smite.] These two kings were conquered by Moses before they came into Ca-nan (Num. xxii).

Moses the servant of the Lord gave it for a possession unto the Reubenites, &c.] See Num. xxxii. and Deut.
iii. 12, xiii. 8. He gave Moses the title of "the servant of the Lord" twice in this verse, to make them sensible that this war against the two kings before named was made by Divine authority; and that their land was afterward given to the Reubenites, &c.
by the same authority.

Ver. 7. These are the kings.] They that follow in the rest of the chapter.

Of the country which Joshua smote on this side Jordan.
In the late wars, before mentioned in this book.

On the west.] Westward of Jordan.
From Baal-gad—unto the mount Halak.] This was the northern and southern bounds of the country of these kings (see xi. 17).

Which Joshua gave unto the tribes.] Unto the rest of the tribes, who had not their share on the other side Jordan (xi. 23).

Ver. 8. In the mountains, and in the valleys, and in the plains.] This is a description of the condition of the country; in which valleys and plains differ only in this, that the former were such as lay between mountains, and the latter, the flat country, which was re-more from mountains.

In the springs.] Which commonly were at the foot of mountains.

In the wilderness, and in the south country;] These are joined together, because their wildernesses were southerly, in the hottest and driest part of the land:
whereby we are not to understand countries without people; but that were thinly peopled, in comparison with other parts of the land. For we read of houses and towns in the wilderness, 1 Kings ix. 18. xi. 34.

The Hittites, &c.] This may relate either to the kings, or the countries, forementioned.

Ver. 9. King of Jericho, one.] He is first mentioned, because first conquered.

King of Ai.] He was the next.

Which is beside Beth-el, one.] The people of which place came to assist the king of Ai; and were conquered at the same time (viii. 17).

Ver. 10. King of Jerusalem, one.] Who was the next that opposed Joshua, and therefore next mentioned (x. 1).

King of Hebron, one.] He, and the next three, the kings of Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (ver. 11, 12), joined with the king of Jerusalem and were vanquished at the same time.

Ver. 12. King of Gezer, one.] He came out to help Lachish, and was smitten at the same time (x.
33).

Ver. 13. King of Debir, one.] Mentioned x. 38.

King of Geder, one.] We read not of him before; but we find several towns in the tribe of Judah of the same or neighbouring name, viz. Gederah, and Gede-roth, and Gedroothaim, and Gider (xx. 41. 56.
2 Chron. xviii. 18). All which, as Bochartus observes, have their name ± Seminten, "from the fence that was about them" (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 36).

Ver. 14. King of Hormah, one; the king of Arad, one.] We have no mention of these kings before;
but we know that Hormah was a city in the tribe of Judah (xx. 30. Judges i. 17. 1 Sam. xxx. 30), and afterward given to Simeon (Josh. xix. 4). Arad also was a place in the tribe of Judah, as appears by the story iii. Judges i. 16.

Ver. 15. King of Libnah, one.] Mentioned before
(x. 29).

King of Adullam, one.] This was a city in the same tribe of Judah (xx. 33. 1 Sam. xxii. 1).

King of Beth-el, one.] We read not of any king here before; but it seems there was one depending upon Ai (viii. 17).

Ver. 17. King of Tappuah, one.] There were two cities of this name; one in the tribe of Judah, (xx.
34), the other in the tribe of Ephrain (xvii. 8). It is 18 The king of Aphek, one; the king of La-sharon, one;
19 The king of Madon, one; the king of Ha-zer, one;
20 The king of Shimron-meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one;
21 The king of Taanach, one; the king of Megiddo, one;
22 The king of Kedesh, one; the king of Jokneam of Carmel, one;
23 The king of Dor in the coast of Dor, one;
the king of the nations of Gilgal, one; 24 The king of Tirzah, one; all the kings thirty and one.

probable the latter is here meant; because the king of it is mentioned next to the king of Beth-el, which was in the confines of Benjamin and Ephraim. And immediately follows the king of Hepher; which was a place not far off, in the tribe of Zebulun.

King of Hepher, one.] We read of the land of Hepher, in 1 Kings iv. 10. Which St. Jerome saith was in the tribe of Zebulun, near Sephorin, or Diocesarea.

Ver. 18. King of Aphek.] There were two Apheks in this country which Joshua conquered, one in the tribe of Judah (viii. 52), and another in the tribe of Asher (Josh. xix. 1), another in the tribe of Asher (Judg. xix. 53). Which of them is here intended, cannot certainly be determined.

King of Lasharon, one.] This place is never named any where else in Scripture. But I take it foraron (as the Vulgar Latin here doth, leaving out the first syllable), which was a city near Lydda, as we learn from Acts ix. 38. But the country about it was very pleasant and fruitful (Isa. xxxiii. 9, xxxv. 2). There was another Sharon also on the other side of Jordan, in the east, in the country of the Gadites (1 Chron. v.
16), of which some think the prophet Isaiah speaks, lxv . 10.

Ver. 19. King of Madon, one; the king of Hazor, one;] Both of these are mentioned before, as conquered by Joshua (xi. 1).

Ver. 20. King of Shimron-meron, one; the king of Achshaph, one.] These two are mentioned in the same place (xi. 1). And Shimron was in the tribe of Zebulon; and Achshaph in the tribe of Asher (xix. 15.
25). The former hath the addition of Meron to it in this place, to distinguish it from some other Shimron; which some think was in the tribe of Ephraim, called Shomeron, or Samaria.

Ver. 21. King of Taanach, one.] A city given to the tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11), and in the confines of Zebulon. It belonged to the Levites (xxi. 25); but the old inhabitants were not expelled out of it (Judg.
i. 27).

King of Megiddo, one.] This city fell to the same tribe, as we read in the same place; and was near the river Kishon; as may be gathered from Judg. v. 19. The Cananities were not driven out of this city (Judg. i.
27).

Ver. 22. King of Kedesh, one.] There were two cities called Kedesh, or Kadish; one in the tribe of Judah (xv. 23), the other in the tribe of Naphtali (xii.
37), the latter is here meant; for it was a fenced city, as we read there; but the other was of no note.

King of Jokneam of Carmel, one.] A city in the tribe of Zebulun, at the bottom of Mount Carmel, near the river Belus (xiv. 11), and one of the cities of the Levites (xxi. 34). It had its name from its deglitful situation, as Bochart conjectures, lib. i.
Canaan, cap. 28.

Ver. 23. King of Dor—one.] A city in the lot of the tribe of Manasseh (xvii. 11), which had a large territory belonging to it, called after its name: for it was a royal city, and one of the most ancient in Phcenicia, as Bochart observes. It so strong, also, that the Israelites could not get possession of it (or could not keep out the ancient inhabitants), when it fell to the portion of Manassesh (Judg. i. 27). Nor could Antiochus Sidetes, in future times, take it, though he laid siege to it with a very great army (lib. i. Canaan, cap. 41).

King of the nations of Gilgal, one.] This Gilgal is not the place where Joshua encamped when he came over Jordan; for there was no city there, nor any king of that country, but the king of Jericho. That place also had its name from the circumcision of the Israelites there (ver. 9). We have no mention indeed of any other Gilgal in Scripture; but St. Jerome says, in his time, there was a place called Gelgel, about six miles from Antipatris, which was near the sea, not far from Joppa. Hither, it is likely, merchants from several countries resorted; and thence the chief ruler there was called the king of the nations of Gilgal.
Some finding mention of Galilee of the nations, fancy that it is the place here meant. But that name, for some part of Galilee, was not known in the days of Joshua; being occasioned by Solomon's giving Hiram twenty towns in this country (1 Kings ix. 11). So the same St. Jerome.

Ver. 24. King of Tirzah, one.] It is not certain in what part of the country this city was; but it is very probable in the lot of the tribe of Ephraim. For Jerboam (who was of this tribe) and his successors, made it the royal seat until the building of Samaria (1 Kings xiv. 17, xvi. 23, 24).

All the kings thirty and one.] Some cannot believe that in so small a country there were so many kings.
But they should consider, that these kings were only petty princes, or lords of cities, which had a few villages depending on them, the inhabitants of which were their tenants. This appears by ver. 9, where we read of the king of Beth-el; which was so small a place, that he and the king of Ai, joined together, had but twelve thousand and seventy souls (xvii. 25). For kings, like all other things, were anciently very small in their beginnings. See upon Gen. xiv. 1. and Gro-tius upon the first verse of this chapter, and Masius upon the seventh. Unto which may be added, that Caesar, in his fifth book of his Commentaries, speaks of four kings here in the county of Kent alone: how many then were there in all Britain! for it appears by Tacitus, that the Sifures and the Brigantes had their own kings also. And Caesar informs us, that in France there were as many kings as princes; and so it was in Spain, as Livy writes. And Vopiscus, in the life of the emperor Probus, relates, that when he was in Germany, reguli novem ex diversis gentibus, &c. "nine petty kings came from divers nations, and threw themselves at his feet;" as he himself wrote to the senate of Rome, in a letter which is there recorded.
In which he call them novem reges, "nine kings."
CHAPTER XIII.

1 The bounds of the land not yet conquered. 8 The inheritance of the two tribes and half. 14, 33 The Lord and his sacrifices are the inheritance of Levi. 15 The bounds of the inheritance of Reuben. 22 Baalath in G. 24 The bounds of the inheritance of Gad, 29 and of the half tribe of Manasseh.

1 Now Joshua was old and stricken in years; and the Lord said unto him, Thou art old and stricken in years, and there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed.

2 This is the land that yet remaineth: all the borders of the Philistines, and all Geshuri,

3 From Sihor, which is before Egypt, even unto the borders of Ekron northward, which is counted to the Canaanite: five lords of the Philistines; the Gazathites, and the Ashdodites, the Eshkalonites, the Gittites, and the Ekronites; also the Avites:

4 From the south, all the land of the Canaanites, and Mearah that is beside the Sidonians, unto Aphek, to the borders of the Amorites:

5 And the land of the Giblites, and all Lebanon, toward the sunrise, from Baal-gad under mount Hermon unto Hamath.

6 All the inhabitants of the hill country from Lebanon unto Misrephoth-maim, and all the Si-read in future times, that Achish was king of Gath; having; it seems, in David’s days, made himself more absolute than the former lords of that place.

The Gazathites, &c. These people had their names from the five principal cities in this country, where they inhabited; which are commonly known.

Also the Avites. These were a people mixed with them, being a remnant (as I said before) of the ancient inhabitants of this country. But there was no distinct lord of them; there being but five in all; and so many without one over these. Some have confounded them with the Hivites; but their name is quite different in the Hebrew, and so is their country. For the Hivites lived in Hermon in the north; and these here in the west. From whence, though they were driven by the Caphtorites (Dent. ii. 23), yet some of them, it seems, remained; as several of the Canaanites did, when the Israelites dispossessed them of their country. See Bochartus, in his Phaleg, lib. iv. cap. 36. who thinks they were not the offspring of Canaan; but it is manifest they inhabited part of the country belonging to him: for Sidon was the first-born of Canaan, who was settled on that coast; and the border of the Canaanites is said to be from thence unto Gaza (Gen. x. 19).

Ver. 4. From the south. Of the Philistines’ country.

All the land of the Canaanites. All that tract of land which belonged to the people properly called Canaanites; who lived upon the sea-coast.

And Mearah. We find no mention of this place elsewhere: some translate it, a cave.

That is beside the Sidonians. Who were in the northern point of that sea-coast.

Unto Aphek. See xii. 18, where I observed there were two cities of this name; but it is most reasonable here to understand that in the tribe of Ashur; whose king though Joshua had slain, he had not taken his country.

Amorites. Who were in these parts: for they being a mighty people had dispersed themselves, not only in the east, and in the south, but in these northern regions.

Ver. 5. Giblites. A people inhabiting a city called Gebal, and the country about it, near to Tyre and Sidon; as appears from Ezek. xxvii. 9. and in I Kings v. 18. they are mentioned as stone-cutters, sent by Hiram king of Tyre to king Solomon (see also Ps. lxxiii. 7. 8).

All Lebanon, toward the sun-rising. They extended their conquests thus far (xi. 17) but could not subdue the eastern part of this country.

From Baal-gad—unto the entering into Hamath. Concerning Baal-gad, see xi. 17. and concerning “the entering into Hamath,” Num. xxxiv. 8.
CHAPTER XIII.

977

And Gilgal, and the border of the Geshurites and Maachathites, and all mount Hermon, and all Bashan unto Salcah;

12 All the kingdom of Og in Bashan, which reigned in Ashtaroth and Edrei, who remained of the remnant of the giants: for these did Moses smite, and cast them out.

13 Nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites, nor the Maachathites: but the Geshurites and the Maachathites dwell among the Israelites unto this day.

14 Only unto the tribe of Levi he gave none inheritance; the sacrifices of the Lord God of Israel made by fire are their inheritance, as he said unto them.

15 ¶ And Moses gave unto the tribe of Reuben inheritance according to their families.
16 And their coast was from Arcah, that is on the bank of the river Arnon, and the city that is in the midst of the river, and all the plain by Medeba;

17 Beth-beshan, and all her cities that are in the plain; Dibon, and Bamoth-baal, and Beth-basar.

18 And Jabesh, and Megido, and Kedemoth.

19 And Kirjathaim, and Sinim, and Zareh-shahar, in the mount of the valley.

20 Beth-peor, and Ashdoth-pisgah, and Beth-jeshimoth.

21 And all the cities of the plain, and all the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, which reigned in Heshbon, whom Moses smote with the princes of Midian, Evi, and Rekem, and Zeeb, and Bus, and Phu, who were chief princes of Sihon, dwelling in the country.

22 And the son of Beor, the soothsayer, did the children of Israel keep the word among them that were slain by them.

23 And the border of the children of Reuben was Jordan, and the border thereof. Thus was the inheritance of the children of Reuben according to their families.

24 And Moses gave inheritance unto the tribe of Gad, even unto the children of Gad according to their families.

25 And their coast was Jazer, and all the cities of Gilead, and half the land of the children of Ammon, unto Aroer, that is before Rabbah;
CHAPTER XIII.

26 And from Heshbon unto Ramath-mizpeh, and Betonim; and from Mahanaim unto the border of Debar;
27 And in the valley, Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, and Zaphon, the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon; and his border, even unto the edge of the sea of Chinnereth on the other side Jordan eastward.
28 This is the inheritance of the children of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages.
29 And Moses gave inheritance unto half the tribe of Manasseh: and this was the possession of the half tribe of the children of Manasseh by their families.

26 And from Heshbon unto Ramath-mizpeh, and Betonim; and from Mahanaim unto the border of Debar;
27 And in the valley, Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah, and Succoth, and Zaphon, the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon, and his border, even unto the edge of the sea of Chinnereth on the other side Jordan eastward.
28 This is the inheritance of the children of Gad after their families, the cities, and their villages.
29 And Moses gave inheritance unto half the tribe of Manasseh: and this was the possession of the half tribe of the children of Manasseh by their families.

30 And their coast was from Mahanaim, all Bashan, all the kingdom of Og king of Bashan, and all the towns of Jair, which are in Bashan, threescore cities:
31 And half Gilead, and Ashtaroth, and Edrei, cities of the kingdom of Og in Bashan, were pertaining unto the children of Machir the son of Manasseh, even to the one half of the children of Machir by their families.

The cities of Gilead.] That lay next to Jazer: for half of Gilead was given to the children of Manasseth (ver. 31).

Half the land of the children of Ammon.] The children of Israel took nothing from them, but were expressly forbidden to meddle with their country (Deut. ii. 19). He speaks therefore of that part of their country which Sihon had taken from them (as he did part of the Moabites' country, Numb. xxxi. 26), and the Israelites, having vanquished Sihon, justly possessed, from Arnon to Jabok; as Jephtha represented to the Ammonites, when they demanded this land as belonging to them: when the Israelites had enjoyed it near three hundred years (Judg. xii. 32, &c.).

Unto Aroer.] This was the bounds of that country taken from the Ammonites by Sihon, from Aroer unto Jabok; for Aroer was seated upon Arnon before mentioned (Judg. xi. 13).

That is before Rabbah.] Over against Rabbah, the chief city of the Ammonites' country: which was in the north part of it, as Aroer in the south.

Ver. 26. From Heshbon.] See ver. 17.

Unto Ramath-mizpeh.] The same with Ramoth-Gilead, of which we read xx. 8, and many other places. It seems to be the same place which is called Mizpeh of Gilead, where Jephthah the Gileadite lived (Judg. xi. 32, 34).

Betonim.] We know no more of this place, than that it was, in all likelihood, a city in the north part of this tribe, as Ramoth-Gilead was; and Heshbon in the south.

From Mahanaim.] This was a city built in that place where Jacob saw the camps of angels (Gen. xxxii. 1, 2). It was not far from the river Jabbok, as appears from that chapter, ver. 22. This city was very considerable in after-times; Ish-bosheth, who reigned over Israel after Saul, having his residence here; and David making some stay here when he fled from Absalom (2 Sam. ii. 8, 12, xvii. 27). It was one of the Levitical cities (xxi. 37).

Unto Debar.] There was another city of this name in the tribe of Judah (xv. 15, 49). But this was (as St. Jerome and Eusebius tell us) a city of the Ammonites upon Jordan.

Ver. 27. Beth-aram, and Beth-nimrah.] Having mentioned the frontier places, he comes to speak of those cities which were in the midst of the country. And these two are mentioned, Numb. xxxix. 36. The latter of these is called Beth-nimrah (Domus Perduramos), as Bochart interprets it, is simply called Nimrah in the third verse of that chapter. And the waters of Nimrim (Isa. xi. 6), seem to have been in the same place; which Moses and Joshua say belonged to the Gadites: but Isaiah and Jeremiah call it a city of the Moabites: who, in the days of those prophets, after the ten tribes were carried captive, recurred those places (see Bochartius in his Hieromnemon, par. i. lib. iii. cap. 7).
32 These are the countries which Moses did distribute for inheritance in the plains of Moab, on the other side Jordan, by Jericho, eastward.

Ver. 33.] Which countries, with their bounds and limits, are thus particularly described, that every tribe might rest satisfied with God's appointment, and not invade their brethren's territories.

Ver. 33.] This had been noted before in this very chapter, ver. 14, and is again noted, xiv. 3, 4, and again, xviii. 7. Which frequent repetition was for the honour of this tribe; and that the people might have the greater regard to them, and care of them.

CHAPTER XIV.

1 The nine tribes and a half are to have their inheritance by lot. 6 Caleb by privilege obtaineth Hebron.

1 And these are the countries which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan, which Eleazor the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel, distributed for inheritance to them.

2 By lot was their inheritance, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses, for the nine tribes, and for the half tribe.

3 For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and an half tribe on the other side Jordan; but unto the Levites he gave none inheritance among them.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 1. These are the countries] viz. Those mentioned in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and following chapters; for this chapter is but a kind of preface to the division of the land.

Which the children of Israel inherited in the land of Canaan.] Which was now conquered by Joshua; as that of Sihon and Og had been by Moses.

Which Eleazar, &c. distributed for inheritance to them.] According to the command given by God to Moses, Numb. xxxiv. 17, 18, where the names of the twelve heads of the tribes, or the princes (as they are there called), are set down, ver. 19, 20, &c.

Ver. 2. By lot was their inheritance.] To take away all occasion of controversy, the matter being determined by God.

As the Lord commanded] Numb. xxvi. 55, 56, xxxiii. 51. For the nine tribes and for the half tribe.] Who were to be provided for in the land of Canaan; as the other, it here follows, had been on the other side Jordan.

Ver. 3. For Moses had given the inheritance of two tribes and an half tribe on the other side Jordan; this seems to argue a strong faith, which the nine tribes and half had in the promise of God, that they were contented to see their brethren put in actual possession of their inheritance, when they were only in hope of their portion.

But unto the Levites he gave none inheritance.] Neither on this side Jordan, nor on the other; as was said before, xiii. 33, and mentioned here again for the reason following.

Ver. 4. For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim.] The privilege of the first-born was transferred from Reuben to Joseph (1 Chron. v. 1, 2), from whose two sons sprung two tribes: so that there were still twelve tribes, without reckoning Levi for one (Gen. xliii. 5, 6).

Therefore they gave no part unto the Levites.] Because the children of Joseph succeeded in their room, as the Vulgar Latin translates the foregoing words; that is, to make up the number of twelve tribes.

For the children of Joseph were two tribes, Manasseh and Ephraim: therefore they gave no part unto the Levites in the land, save cities to dwell in, with their suburbs for their cattle and for their substance.

5 As the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel did, and they divided the land.

6 ¶ Then the children of Judah came unto Joshua in Gilgal: and Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenizite said unto him, Thou knowest the thing that the Lord said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnea.

6 But unto the tribe of Levi Moses gave not any inheritance: the Lord God of Israel was their inheritance, as he said unto them.
CHAPTER XIV.

7 Forty years old was I when Moses the servant of the Lord sent me from Kadesh-barnea to espy out the land; and I brought him word again as it was in mine heart.

8 Nevertheless my brethren that went up with me made me the head of the people melt: but I wholly followed the Lord my God.

9 And Moses sware on that day, saying, Surely the land wherein thy feet have trodden shall be thine inheritance, and thy children's for ever, because thou hast wholly followed the Lord my God.

10 And now, behold, the Lord hath kept me alive, as he said, these forty and five years, even since the Lord spake this word unto Moses, while the children of Israel wandered in the wilderness: and now, lo, I am this day fourscore and five years old.

11 As yet I am as strong this day as I was in the day that Moses sent me: as my strength was then, even so is my strength now, for war, both to go out, and to come in.

12 Now therefore give me this mountain, whereof the Lord spake in that day; for thou heardest in that day how the Anakims were there, and that the cities were great and fenced: if so be the Lord will be with me, then I shall be able to drive them out, as the Lord said.

13 And Joshua blessed him, and gave unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh Hebron for an inheritance.

14 Hebron therefore became the inheritance of...
Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenizite unto this day, because that he wholly followed the Lord God of Israel.

15 And the name of Hebron before was Kirjath-arba; which Arba was a great man among the Anakims. And the land had rest from war.

day, who are of great power, by the name of magnates. He was the father of Anak (xx. 13. and xxi. 11), who either built this city, or fortified it, or made it his royal seat (being a kind of prince among them), and perhaps was here buried; which made it he called his city (see upon Numb. xiii. 23).

The land had rest from war.] Which gave them liberty to divide the land. This was said before (xi. ult.), and now repeated, perhaps to show that what is here reported concerning Caleb was done some time ago, at the end of the war; and now mentioned to show, that he held this portion of land by a Divine donation, before the country was divided by lot.

CHAPTER XV.

1 The borders of the lot of Judah. 13 Caleb’s portion and conquest. 16 Othniel, for his valour, hath Achshah, Caleb’s daughter, to wife. 18 She obtained a blessing of her father. 21 The cities of Judah. 63 The Jebusites not conquered.

1 This then was the lot of the tribe of the children of Judah by their families; even to the border of Edom the wilderness of Zin southward was the uttermost part of the south coast.

2 And their south border was from the shore of the salt sea, from the bay that looketh southward:

3 And it went out to the south side to Maaleh-acrahibbim, and passed along to Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto Kadesh-barnea, and passed along to Hezron, and went up to Adar, and fetched a compass to Karkaa:

4 From thence it passed toward Azmon, and went out unto the river of Egypt; and the going out of that coast were at the sea: this shall be your south coast.

Ver. 2. From the shore of the salt sea.] The foregoing verse was a short description of the length of Judah’s country: now he describes the bounds of it on all quarters; and here saith, that the Salt, or Dead, sea, was the bounds of it on the south-east. For so it was, as here follows.

From the bay that looketh southward] In the Hebrew, from the tongue; which signifies either a creek, or a promontory, as some understand it, pointing to the south-east (see Numb. xxvii. 2).

Ver. 3. To the south side to Maaleh-acrahibbim.] There was a mountain so called, from the multitude of scorpions that were there. It lay at the end of this lake (Numb. xxxiv. 4). From whence the country of Aerabatene had its name, as Bochart thinks (see Hieroz. par. ii. lib. v. cap. 29), which lay near the country of Edom (1 Macc. v. 3).

To Zin, and ascended up on the south side unto Kadesh-barnea.] This is the very description of the southern bounds of the promised land, Numb. xxxiv. 4.

To Hezron.] There is nothing said of this place in the book of Numbers; but it appears to have been a city from the twenty-fifth verse of this chapter.

Went up to Adar.] This place is mentioned in the forenamed Numb. xxxiv. 4, and called Hazar- ADDAR. So that Hezron lay between Kadesh-barnea and this town.

Fetched a compass to Karkaa.] This place is not mentioned in Numbers, or any where else; but lay beyond Adar, not in a right line, but bending towards the west.

Ver. 4. Toward Azmon.] This is mentioned in the forenamed place, Numb. xxxiv. 4.

The goings out of that coast were at the sea.] That is, the Mediterranean sea (see Numb. xxxiv. 5).

This shall be your south coast.] From the tongue of the Salt sea to the Mediterranean.
CHAPTER XV.

And the east border was the salt sea, even unto the end of Jordan. And their border in the north quarter was from the bay of the sea at the uttermost part of Jordan:

And the border went up to Beth-hogla, and passed along by the north of Beth-arabah; and the border went up to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben:

And the border went up toward Debir from the valley of Achor, and so northward, looking toward Gilgal, that is before the going up to Adummim, which is on the south side of the river; and the border passed toward the waters of En-shemesh, and the going out thereof were at En-rogel:

And the border went up by the valley of the son of Hinnom unto the south side of the Jebusite; the same is Jerusalem: and the border went up to the top of the mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward, which is at the end of the valley of the giants northward:

And the border was drawn from the top of the hill unto the fountain of the water of Neph-toah, and went out to the cities of mount Ephron; and the border was drawn to Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim:

And the border compassed from Baalah westward unto mount Seir, and passed along unto the side of mount Jearim, which is Chesalon, on the north side, and went down to Beth-shemesh, and passed on to Timnah:

And the border went out unto the side of the valley of the son of Hinnom! A famous place on the east side of Jerusalem; and so delightfully shady, that it invited them to idolatrous worship in this valley, whereby it became infamous (2 Kings xxiii. 10. Jer. vii. 92). Hinnom, in all probability, was some eminent person, in ancient times, who was the owner of this valley: for it is sometimes called the valley "of the children of Hinnom," which shows his posterity were planted here. After it was polluted by idolatry, it became a place where they threw all their filth, and excrements, and dead carcasses, and where there was a continual fire, the Jews say, to burn bones, and such sordid things as were thrown here; from whence, they think, it became the name for hell-fire.

Of the Jebusite. i. e. The city of the Jebusites.

The same is Jerusalem Which is called Jebusi, in the last verse of the eighteenth chapter, and Jobus, Judg. xix. 10. Especially that part of it forfied by the Jebusites, which was called Mount Sion, and lay on the south of Jerusalem.

To the top of the mountain Which is thought to be Mount Moriah.

That lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward. It was westward to the valley of Hinnom; and so had that valley on the east of it.

All the end of the valley of the giants northward. Which mountain lay on the north part the valley of Rephaim (as the word is in the Hebrew), which was in the tribe of Judah extending itself from Mount Moriah as far as Bethlehem, as Josephus tells us.

Unto the fountain of the water of Neph-toah. Where this fountain, or well of water was, cannot he known; for it is nowhere mentioned but here, and in xviii. 15.

This place also is unknown; for it cannot be that in the tribe of Ephraim, mentioned 1 Chron. xiii. 19.

To Baalah, which is Kirjath-jearim. Called ver. 60, and xviii. 14, Kirjath-Baal; there being, it is likely, a temple of Baal in this place, whose name the Israelites changed into Kirjath-jearim; which signifies urbs sylvanum, because of the goodly trees hereabout, which made it the fitter for idolatrous uses.

Compassed from Baalah westward Not in a direct line, but bending towards the west.

Unto Mount Seir. Not that mount belonging to the Edomites, but another of that name.

Unto the side of mount Jearim, which is Chesalon, on the north side. This was a woody country, as appears from the name of this mountain, and from Mount Seir also; which signifies as much as hairy.

To Beth-Sheanesh. A known place in the tribe of Judah, and a city of the priests (xxi. 16).
Ekrón northward: and the border was drawn to Shicron, and passed along to mount Baalah, and went out unto Jебneel; and the goings out of the border were at the sea.

12 And the west border was to the great sea, and the coast thereof. This is the coast of the children of Judah round about according to their families.

13 And unto Caleb the son of Jephunneh he gave a part among the children of Judah, according to the commandment of the Lord to Joshua, even the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron.

14 And Caleb drove thence the three sons of Anak, Sheshai, and Ahiman, and Talmai, the children of Anak.

15 And he went up thence to the inhabitants of Debir: and the name of Debir before was Kirjath-sepher.

16 ¶ And Caleb said, He that smiteh Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achshah my daughter to wife.

17 And Othniel the son of Kenaz, the brother of Caleb, took it: and he gave him Achshah his daughter to wife.

18 And it came to pass, as she came unto him, that she moved him to ask of her father a field: and she lighted off her ass; and Caleb said unto her, What wouldest thou? 19 Who answered, Give me a blessing; for thou hast given me a south land; give me also springs of water. And he gave her the upper springs, and the nether springs.

20 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Judah according to their families.

21 And the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah toward the coast of Edom southward were Kabzeel, and Elder, and Jagur, 22 And Kinah, and Dimonah, and Adahadah, 23 And Kedesh, and Hazor, and Ithnan, 24 Ziph, and Telem, and Bealoth, 25 And Hazor, and Hadattah, and Kerioth, and Hezon, which is Hazor, 26 Anam, and Shema, and Moladah, 27 And Hazar-gaddah, and Heshmon, and Beth-palet, field upon her. Or, perhaps, she moved him to give her leave to ask it of her father; as she did, either by his permission, or by his desire; who might tell her, it was more proper for her to ask it than himself. She lighted off her ass.] Upon which they rode then in those countries; having no horses, nor mules, till aftertimes. And her lighting down was in reverence to her father; unto whom she addressed herself in an humble posture.

Caleb said unto her, What wouldst thou? He seems to have prevented her request; knowing, by her posture, she had something to desire of him. But Ludov. De Dieu takes it quite otherwise; that when she came to her husband's house, she did not alight from her ass but continued still sitting upon it. Which her father observing, and asking her the reason, why she did not come down and go to her husband; she told him, she had first a thing to beg of him. And thus both the LXX. and the Vulgar translate it, as if she did not altogether, but sighted and cried, in τοις ἀπόστολοι, from the ass on which she sat.

Ver. 19. Give me a blessing.] Bestow a gift upon me, as the word blessing is used, Gen. xxxiii. 11, or make a mark; hence the word signifies complete.

For thou hast given me a south land.] A dry country; being both mountainous and towards the south; that is, towards the deserts of Arabia, from whence very hot and scorching winds were wont to blow.

Give me also springs of water.] A field hard by, wherein were springs of water: for it was not merely the springs she begged, but the ground in which they were; as appears from the foregoing verse, where she moved her husband to ask a field.

He gave her the upper — and the nether springs.] Whereby that dry ground might be watered and made fruitful. He seems to have given her more than she desired; not only these springs that were in the mountain, but those which were below also. That so neither the rising ground, nor the plain, might want water; as Arius Montanus expounds it.

Ver. 20.] Now follows an account of the cities within the lot of this tribe; which were assigned to their several families, after Hebron, which was the principal of them (for here David reigned over the tribe of Judah alone seven years), was given to Caleb. Which the Jews generally think he did not get into his possession till after the death of Joshua; as is related in the book of Judges (see there, i. 11—13, &c.).

Ver. 21. The uttermost cities — of Judah] Those that were in the confines; for he doth not seem to number all that were in the heart of the country. So the Jews think, though the truth is, as will appear in the following part of the chapter, he only begins with the outmost cities, but afterward proceeds to those that were in the midst of the country.

Towards the coast of Edom southward] He begins with those that lay on the south side of the country; which was the border he first described, ver. 1, 2.

Kabzeel.] Where that valiant person Benjah was born, who smote two lion-like men of Moab (1 Chron. xi. 22).

Eder.] Which Eusebius calls Ἐδώρ. But he hath no more to say of it; nor of Jagur, and the rest that follow, but that they were in the tribe of Judah; nor shall I go about to inquire further after every particular city mentioned; the number of which is summed up ver. 32.

Ver. 32. All the cities are twenty and nine, with their villages.] If the foregoing places be told, there are no less than thirty and eight of them. But there were only twenty and nine of them (as some solve the difficulty), that could be called cities; the other being only villages. Or the meaning is (as the Jews generally think) that twenty and nine only belonged to the tribe of Judah; the rest being afterward given to the tribe of Simeon, as we find in the nineteenth chapter; where nine of these very cities here mentioned are said to be in that tribe, viz. Beer-sheba, Moladah, Hazar-shual, Baalah, Azem, Hormah, Ziklag, Ain, and Rimmon: which nine, with the twenty and nine here set down as the sum total make just thirty and eight. And this seems to be the truer account, because the villages of other cities are mentioned ver. 36 and 41, and yet none of them set down by name, as is supposed in the first interpretation of these words.

Ver. 33. In the valley.] Or in the plain below the mountains: but which way I shall not examine; because the geography of this country will be done, I hope, by a better hand.

Ver. 36. Fourteen cities.] There are fifteen in all, if we take the last two for distinct cities. But in all probability there might be one, called indifferently Gederah, or (as we translate it in the margin) Gederothaim. Perhaps there might be a double city, the old and the new: or Gederothaim was an appendix to Gederah, as the borough of Southwark is to the city of London.

Ver. 37. Zenan, and Hadashah, &c.] I suppose Japhleti, unto the coast of Beth-horon the nether, and to Gezer: and the goings out thereof are at the sea.

4 So the children of Joseph, Manasseh and Ephraim, took their inheritance.

5 ¶ And the border of the children of Ephraim according to their families was thus; even the border of their inheritance on the east side was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper;

6 And the border went out toward the sea to Michmethath on the north side; and the border went about eastward unto Taanath-shiloh, and passed by it on the east to Janohah;

7 And it went down from Janohah to Ataroth, a neighbouring city to Joppa, Azotus, and Jaminia (see his annot. upon, lib. xvi. Strabonis, p. 361, 362).

The goings out thereof are at these. The Vulgar hath it, “at the great sea.” which is certainly here meant; this being a short description of the lot of this tribe from Jordan on the east to the Mediterranean on the west.

Ver. 4.] According to the following measures, which give a more particular account of what is before said in general.

Ver. 4. The border of the children of Ephraim. And first, he shows what was given to Ephraim, reserving the description of Manasseh’s portion to the next chapter.

On the east side The north-east. For he describes, though grossly, only the breadth of this lot from south to north.

Was Ataroth-addar, unto Beth-horon the upper. The first of those was in the south, and the latter in the north.

Ver. 6. Toward the sea From Beth-horon the upper this northern border went on one side westward towards the Mediterranean.

To Michmethath on the north side. And on the other side eastward towards Jordan. This is very obscurely expressed; but it appears, from what follows, it must be thus interpreted.

Eastward unto Taanath-shiloh. Still proceeded further eastward unto this place; the name of which only is now known.

Passed by it on the east to Janohah.] Another place easternly, of which we are now ignorant. For there are no records left to make us understand whereabouts in the east it was situated; which was perfectly understood when this country was inhabited by the Ephraimites.

Ver. 7. It went down from Janohah—and came to Jericho.] Not to the very city, for that belonged to Benjamin; but to the country adjoining.

Went out at Jordan.] Which was the eastern bounds of this country.

Ver. 8. From Tappuah westward unto the river Kanah.] He returns to describe the length of it from east to west; if the river or brook Kanah be the same with the brook Cherith, mentioned 1 Kings xvii. 3. And so not only Adricomas understands it, but that great man Bochartus: who observes, it was called the brook Cherith, from the Hebrew word eava, which signifies to eat or feed, because here God commanded the ravens to feed Elijah; and it was called Kanah, from the multitude of reeds which grew there (and so the Vulgar here translates it, the valley of reeds), in which it may be supposed Elijah lay hid (Hierozoe, par. ii. lib. ii. cap. 14). But there is so much to be objected against this situation of the brook Kanah, that I must leave it in suspense whether it were in the east, or in the west; and confess with Conradas Pellicanus that as none of the Hebrews or Latins have given a satisfactory account of these last four verses, so I do not pretend to it.

At the sea.] Where sea alone is mentioned, it is commonly understood to signify the Mediterranean; which quite overthrows the opinion, which makes Kanah the same with Cherith. But the Vulgar here took it for the Salt sea (adding the word salisismum) which favours the forenamed opinion.

This is the inheritance of Ephraim] A gross description of it.

Ver. 9.] What these separate cities were cannot now be known, because we have not a particular account given of all the cities of this tribe (as we had of Judah), but only of those which were the limits of their country. But they seem to have been some cities in the tribe of Manasseh, which were inhabited by the children of Ephraim, though the territories about them belonged to the Manassites, and were occupied by them (see Grotius, 3

Ver. 10. They drew not out the Canaanites that dwelt in Gezer: but the Canaanites dwelt among the Ephraimites.] The inhabitants of Gezer were properly Canaanites; who dwelt upon the sea coast, where Gezer was situated (see ver. 3). This is mentioned also Judg. i. 29.

Serve under tribute.] They so far subdued them, as to make them tributaries; and some fancy, imposed on them the precepts of the sons of Noah. But they ought to have destroyed them, and were forbidden to make peace with them upon any conditions (see Judg. ii. 1-3). Unless Grotius’ conjecture be true, that the inhabitants of Gezer submitted and accepted the terms of peace, which Joshua was bound to offer them, before he began the war as the Girsaphites, he thinks, also did; who remained even in our Saviour’s time: for they delivered up themselves at the first summons to surrender; which is the reason, he imagines, that they are omitted in the enumeration of their enemies, both in xi. 1, and in Deut. xx. 17 (see his annot. on his thirteenth chapter of the second book De Jure Belli et Pacis, sect. 4).

This city, and the people of it, were destroyed in Solomon’s time by Pharaoh, king of Egypt: who made a present of it to his daughter, Solomon’s wife; who thereupon rebuilt it (1 Kings ix. 16, 17). Till then the Canaanites lived in it; from whence Spinoza would have it concluded, that this book was not written by Joshua, because we find the same thing recorded in the book of Judges (i. 29), which is of a later date. But this is a vexatious cavil: for, as Houtzius well observes, if an historian should have said in the life of Tiberius the Germans were not destroyed, the same might, in like manner, have been said in the life of Vespasian; and just so, when Joshua saith the Gezerites were not cut off by the Ephraimites, it did not hinder him that wrote in the following age from saying the same; because they still remained in the possession of their ancient habitation.
CHAPTER XVII.

1 The lot of Manasseh. 7 His coast. 12 The Canaanites not driven out. 14 The children of Joseph obtain another lot.

1 There was also a lot for the tribe of Manasseh; for he was the firstborn of Joseph;

2 There was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh by their families; for the children of Abiezzer, and for the children of Hezek, and for the children of Asriel, and for the children of Shechem, and for the children of Hepher, and for the children of Gilead: these were the male children of Manasseh the son of Joseph by their families.

3 But Zelophehad, the son of Hepher, the son of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, had no sons, but daughters: and these were the names of his daughters, Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah.

CHAP. XVII.

Ver. 1. There was also a lot for Manasseh: That half of it which had no portion on the other side Jordan.

For he was the firstborn of Joseph, I cannot make any sense of this; and therefore think the particle ki should be translated though, not for. And then the meaning is plain enough, that the lot of Manasseh came up after that of Ephraim (not before it), though he was the first-born of Joseph; for Jacob had preferred Ephraim before him (Gen. xlviii. 19, 20).

For Machir the firstborn of Manasseh, And his only son, from whom sprang such a multitude, that there was no room for them all on the other side Jordan; but part of them were to be disposed of here.

Father of Gilead.] Num. xxvi. 29.

Because he was a man of war.] This is generally thought to relate to Machir; who had done some famous exploits in the skirmishes they had with some neighbouring people while they were in Egypt (see I Chron. vii. 21, 22), for he was not alive to fight when they came to Canaan.

He had Gilead and Bashan.] A share in this country; for some of it was given to the Reubenites and Gadites, xiii. 25, but the Gileadites were also planted here (ver. 31); for, inheriting the valour of their progenitor, they were fit to defend this frontier country.

Ver. 2. There was also a lot for the rest of the children of Manasseh.] A great part of the Manassites being disposed of before they passed over Jordan, now follows the lot which fell to the rest, whose several families he names.

For the children of Abiezzer, &c.] These six families descended from Gilead, as we read Num. xxvi. 30, &c. Where the first of them, who is here called Abiezzer, is there called Jeezer.

These were the male children of Manasseh.] He uses the expression of male children to introduce what follows concerning the females. And they are called "the children of Manasseh," because they inherited in his right; being families descended from him (see Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 29.)

Ver. 3. But Zelophehad, &c.] Here he recites their pedigree from the son of Joseph.

4 And they came near before Eleazar the priest, and before Joshua the son of Nun, and before the princes, saying, The Lord commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our brethren. Therefore according to the commandment of the Lord he gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father.

5 And there fell ten portions to Manasseh, beside the land of Gilead and Bashan, which were on the other side Jordan;

6 Because the daughters of Manasseh had an inheritance among his sons: and the rest of Manasseh's sons had the land of Gilead.

7 And the coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethath, that lieth before Shechem; and the border went along the right hand unto the inhabitants of En-tappuah.

8 Now Manasseh had the land of Tappuah:

Had no sons, but daughters:] And so could not make a family in Manasseh; and consequently have no share in the land.

Mahlah, and Noah,] See Num. xxvi. 33.

Ver. 4. They came near before Eleazar the priest, &c.] To whom God had committed the care of dividing the several lots (xiv. 1 Numb. xxxiv. 17, 18.)

Saying,] See Numb. xxvi. 6, 7.

According to the commandment of the Lord he gave them an inheritance.] Or, an inheritance was given them according to this commandment of God to Moses, by Eleazar and Joshua, and the rest who were appointed to divide the land. For after the lot had determined what land every tribe should have, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, considered how many families there were in the tribe, and how large they were; and accordingly divided it among them. So Num. xxvi. 53, 56, imports.

Ver. 5. There fell ten portions to Manasseh.] For there were six portions given to six sons: but the portion of Hepher, the last of them, being divided into five parts among his five daughters, there were ten portions in all (see Selden, De Successionibus, cap. 23).

Which ten portions being assigned to so many families, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes were not concerned any further in dividing these ten portions into lesser among several households; but that, I suppose, they agreed among themselves.

Beside the land of Gilead and Bashan,] Mentioned before, ver. 1.

Ver. 6. Because the daughters of Manasseh:] That is, of Zelophehad, descended from Manasseh.

Had an inheritance among his sons:] Being considered as heirs to their father.

The rest of Manasseh's sons:] Which were not of the six families before mentioned.

Had the land of Gilead.] On the other side Jordan, as hath been often said; and is again repeated, to prevent all contentions that might arise about their portions.

Ver. 7. The coast of Manasseh was from Asher to Michmethath.] This was the south border, which went from a city called Asher, to another called Michmethath; which was over against a city in the tribe of Ephraim, called Shechem.
but Tappuah on the border of Manasseh belonged to the children of Ephraim;

9 And the coast descended unto the river Kanah, southward of the river; these cities of Ephraim are among the cities of Manasseh: the coast of Manasseh also was on the north side of the river, and the outgoings of it were at the sea:

10 Southward it was Ephraim's, and northward it was Manasseh's, and the sea is his border; and they met together in Asher on the north, and in Issachar on the east.

11 ¶ And Manasseh had in Issachar and in Asher Beth-shean and her towns, and Ibleam and her towns, and the inhabitants of Dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of En-dor and her towns, and the inhabitants of Taamach and her towns, and the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns, and the inhabitants of Megiddo and her towns, even three countries.

12 Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities; but the Canaanites would dwell in that land.

13 Yet it came to pass, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, that they put the Canaanites to tribute; but did not utterly drive them out.

14 And the children of Joseph spoke unto Joshua, saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion to inherit, seeing I am a great people, forasmuch as the Lord hath blessed me hitherto?

15 And Joshua answered them, If thou be a great people, then get thee up to the wood country, and cut down for thyself there in the land of 27, that it was not far from Megiddo, mentioned in the latter end of this verse.

The inhabitants of Dor and her towns.] Concerning Dor, see xi. 2, whose inhabitants, (as also those of the other cities following,) are here mentioned; because, it seems they possessed the people (whom they ought to have destroyed), as well as their cities and towns, making them slaves.

En-dor.] The city whither Saul went to consult with the witch. It was not far from Mount Tabor; which was in the confines of the tribe of Issachar.

Taamach] This city lay not far from the other; and was one of those given to the Levites (xxx. 25).

Megiddo] This was near the sea, not far from the brook Kishon (Judg. v. 19).

Even three countries.] Or rather, three parts of these countries before mentioned.

Ver. 12. Yet the children of Manasseh could not drive out the inhabitants of those cities; Through want of faith in God, and of zeal to perform his commands; which made them slack in their attempts to expel the inhabitants of this country.

But the Canaanites would dwell in that land.] Finding themselves strong enough to maintain it, against such feeble endeavours as they used to conquer it.

Ver. 13. When the children of Israel were waxen strong, to drive the Canaanites to tribute;] When they were more numerous and expert in war, not only the Manassites, but they of other tribes also, brought the Canaanites to be tributaries to them.

But did not utterly drive them out.] In which they grievously offended against God's command (Deut. xx. 16—18).

Saying, Why hast thou given me but one lot and one portion?] They were discontented with their lot, which they thought too strict for them; because they were so very numerous, that the country which was assigned them was little enough for one of them.

The Lord hath blessed me hitherto?] Multiplied them exceedingly, as appears from Numb. xxxv. 34, 37.

Ver. 15. If thou be a great people.] Though he was their flesh and blood, yet Joshua would not humour them; but returns their argument upon them, that since they were so great a people, they should do as here follows.

Then get thee up to the wood country.] Which was in the highlands (ver. 18), which was full of trees; for Asia and Arabick observers, signifies very thick woods (ib. ii. Camaan, cap. 9).
CHAPTER XVIII.

The tabernacle is set up at Shiloh.

And the whole congregation of the children of Israel assembled together at Shiloh, and set up the tabernacle of the congregation there. And the land was subdued before them.

And the children of Joseph said, The hill is not enough for us: and all the Canaanites that dwell in the land of the valley have chariots of iron, both they who are of Beth-shean and her towns, and they who are of the valley of Jezreel.

And Joshua spake unto the house of Joseph, even to Ephraim and to Manasseh, saying:

Thou art a great people, and hast great power; thou shalt not have one lot only:

But the mountain shall be thine; for it is a wood, and thou shalt cut it down: and the outgoings of it shall be thine: for thou shalt drive out the Canaanites, though they have iron chariots, and though they be strong.

The Tabernacle.
2 And there remained among the children of Israel seven tribes, which had not yet received their inheritance.

3 And Joshua said unto the children of Israel, How long are ye slack to go to possess the land, which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you? Give out from among you three men for each tribe: and I will send them, and they shall rise, and go through the land, and describe it according to the inheritance of them; and they shall come again to me.

5 And they shall divide it into seven parts:

consulted him in this case by the oracle of {URIM} and {THUNNAM}. For when he made choice of Mount Sion, an angel bade the prophet Gad tell David he should set up an altar in the threshing-floor of Ornan; and there God answered him by fire, &c. (see 1 Chron. xxii. 18, 25). Now the reason of its being translated to Shiloh, it is likely, was because it would have been too far, after the division of the land, for all the tribes of Israel to go to Gilgal, to perform all that the law required to be done at the tabernacle. Which was now indispensably to be performed, though while they lived in the wilderness they did not live by these rules (Deut. xii. 8–10), and, perhaps, while they continued unsettled in Canaan could not exactly observe them. This place also was very convenient for all the tribes to resort unto; and likewise very safe, being guarded by the two powerful tribes of Judah and Ephraim. And it was, as I said, in the lot of the latter; for it was fit it should be where Joshua was; who, being of this tribe, lived among them. Here it is thought the tabernacle continued for the space of three hundred and fifty years, till the days of Samuel; but our primate before mentioned reckons no more than three hundred and twenty-eight years.

The land was subdued. Or rather, for the land was subdued, &c. that is, continued quiet, without any opposition from the old inhabitants, since the conquest mentioned, xii. 33.

Ver. 2.] For whom no lot had been drawn at Gil-gal. The reason of which was, perhaps, because the land, belonging to the house of Joseph, were not satisfied with the division which was begun to be made there. And therefore Joshua stopped his proceedings till he had made a new survey of the whole country. In order to which, God commanded him to remove hither; from whence, being in the middle of the country, they might do it more easily; and also give the children of Joseph greater content, by settling God's house among them.

Ver. 3. Joshua said unto the children of Israel.] Unto the congregation before mentioned, ver. 1. How long are ye slack to go to possess the land? He doth not blame them for not taking possession of the land which was conquered, without God's direction, by a lot (for that was expressly commanded), but for their being so slow to consider of, and propound some means of making such an equal division, as they desired; that they might take possession of the land, where their lot should fall.

Ver. 4. Give out from among you three men for each tribe.] He therefore himself propounds a method for their satisfaction; and such a one as they could not dislike, viz. that they should choose three men (for he would not appoint them, but only give them orders what to do) out of each of the seven remaining tribes that were not provided for; or rather, out of the nine tribes and a half; that they who had already received their portion, might be willing to resign up some part of it, if they found, upon the survey, there was not sufficient left for their brethren. I will send them.] Give them orders to go immediately through the whole country; both that which was divided, and that which was not. Describe it!] Set down not only the dimensions of it, but its condition and quality, whether barren or fruitful, mountainous or plain, &c. According to the inheritance of them.] Making so many parts in the description, as there remain tribes that want their inheritance. Thus the next verse teaches us to explain it. They shall come again to me.] Make their report to him, when they had done, that he might judge of it. Ver. 5. They shall divide it into seven parts.] Of equal extent, with a just respect, as Josephus observes, not merely to the quantity of ground, but the goodness of the soil. But there was no respect to the greater or lesser number of persons in each tribe; for then these men had given each tribe their portion, and there had been no need of a lot. Their business was to divide the country into seven equal portions, and leave God to appoint which portion should fall to each tribe: who would have no reason to complain, when the division was made by themselves. Judah shall abide in their coast on the south, and the house of Joseph—in the north.] But the lot of Judah, which was southery, and the lot of Ephraim and Manasseh, which, with respect to the former, was northerly, were not to be altered. But these tribes were to dispose of their possessions, unless it should be found that they had more than they needed, and others had less. For this was the very reason of making a new and more exact survey of the country, than had been made before the first division, that there might be an allotment made more to every one's satisfaction, when they had a more perfect account of all the land. Accordingly, it is evident, that the tribe of Judah (by common consent, no doubt) parted with some of their portion to the Simeonites, and the Danites, whose lot appeared to be too scanty (xix. 29, 41).

Ver. 6. Bring the description.] When the men who were appointed to measure the country, had divided it into seven parts, he orders that the description thus divided should be laid before him.

What I may cast lots for you here before the Lord.] Whereby their possessions were settled and established by a Divine authority. For the lots being drawn before the sanctuary, God was desirous to declare what portion every tribe should have. Accordingly, it was their duty to look upon it as a sacred appointment, and to be contented with it; for it was done at the very door of the tabernacle, as we read, xix. 11.

Ver. 7. But the Levites have no part among you.] He declared, what had been often said before, that in the coast of their lot came forth between the children of Judah and the children of Joseph.

12 And their border on the north side was from Jordan; and the border went up to the side of Jericho on the north side, and went up through the mountains westward; and the goings out thereof were at the wilderness of Beth-aven.

13 And the border went over from thence toward Luz, to the side of Luz, which is Beth-el, southward; and the border descended to Arathoth-adar, near the hill that lieth on the south side of the nether Beth-horon.

14 And the border was drawn thence, and compassed the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon southward; and the goings out thereof were at Kirjath-baal,

According to their families.] To be divided according to their families.

Their lot came forth between the children of Judah] Who lay on the south of them.

And the children of Joseph.] For the Ephraimites lay on the north of them. And it is observable, that in the blessing of Moses, Benjamin is placed between Judah and Joseph (Levi having no inheritance among them), which prophecy of Moses by this lot was exactly fulfilled concerning him (Deut. xxxiii. 12).

Ver. 12. Their border on the north side was from Jordan, &c.] Just thus the south border of Ephraim proceeded from Jordan by Jericho, which was in the tribe of Benjamin (see xvi. 1. 7). Through the mountains westward.] Through the mountainous country, which lay on the north of Jericho, it went up to the western part of the country.

At the wilderness of Beth-aven.] A place near Beth-el, which in aftertimes (when they committed foul idolatry there) was called Beth-aven, a house or place of iniquity (Hosae iv. 15. x. 8).

Ver. 13. To the side of Luz, which is Beth-el, southward.] On the south side of that city (see xvi. 2). The Jews think there were two Beth-els; one here named in the confines of Benjamin and Joseph, where Jacob had the vision of the ladder reaching up to heaven, and the other called Bethel, which was at (VIII. 6. 17). Arathoth-adar.] Called in the place forenamed (xvi. 2), Archi-Arathoth.

Another Beth-horon.] A city in the tribe of Ephraim (xvi. 3), called "the nether," because there was a higher land by it in the mountain adjoining. Though others will have the two Beth-horons to have been at a great distance; one in the mountains of Ephraim, the other in the valley near Jordan.

Ver. 14. The border was drawn thence.] In a line bending westward, as appears by what follows in the end of the verse; which tells us the western border began from Beth-horon the nether.

Compassed the corner of the sea southward, from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon.] I cannot give any account of this border, according to our translation; for, it is certain, it did not compass any corner of the Mediterranean (and no other sea can be here meant), nor came near unto it. Therefore, by southward, which we translate corner, must be understood the side of the sea. As if he had said, It ran along in a parallel line to the sea. So the Vulgar hath it, over against the sea; and the LXX. to the same purpose. And the word southward is joined by the Vulgar, not to the sea, but to the next words, "southward from the hill that lieth before Beth-horon."

Southward.] That is, the hill was to the south of Beth-horon, as we read in the verse before.
which is Kirjath-jearim, a city of the children of Judah: this was the west quarter.

15 And the south quarter was from the end of Kirjath-jearim, and the border went out on the west, and went out to the well of waters of Nephtoah:

16 And the border came down to the end of the mountain that lieth before the valley of the son of Hinnom, and which is in the valley of the giants on the north, and descended to the valley of Hinnom, to the side of Jebusi on the south, and descended to En-rogel,

17 And was drawn from the north, and went forth to En-shemes, and went forth toward Geliloth, which is over against the going up of Adummim, and descended to the stone of Bohan the son of Reuben,

18 And passed along toward the side over against Arabah northward, and went down unto Arabah:

Kirjath-Baal. See xv. 60.

This was the west quarter.] Here the penth before mentioned (for it is the same word we before translate corner), the west side, or quarter, ended: for that is meant by its going out.

Ver. 15. The south quarter] The same word again in the Hebrew, viz. penth.

Was from the end of Kirjath-jearim, and the border went out on the west.] Did not go directly south, but bordered something towards the sea, till it came to "the well of waters of Nephtoah," as this verse concludes (see xv. 9). By considering of which, and the foregoing and following verses, it will be unnecessary to say much of this south border of Benjamin, it being the same with the north border of Judah. For the very same places are named here that are there, and in the same order; with this difference only, that in describing this border, he proceeds from the west towards the east; but in describing that of Judah from the east towards the west. So that Kirjath-jearim is there the north limits of Judah, as it is here the south limits of Benjamin.

Ver. 16. Valley of the son of Hinnom.] See xv. 7.

Descending to En-rogel.] See xv. 7.

Ver. 17. Geliloth.] See there; where this place is called Gilgal.

Adummim.] See there, and ver. 6.

Ver. 18. Unto Arabah.] Called Beth-arabah, xv. 6. and so the LXX. have it here in this verse.

Ver. 19. To the side of Beth-hoglah northward.] Leaving Beth-hoglah on the north of it (see xv. 6).

At the north bay of the salt sea.] Its utmost progress was to the tongue or bay of the Salt sea, which is on the north part of it.

South end of Jordan. Where Jordan ends towards the south; being swallowed up by the Salt sea.

This was the south coast.] That is, hither it reached, and here it ended.

Ver. 20. Jordan was the border of it on the east side.]

Till, near Jericho, it met with the bounds of the tribe of Ephraim and Manasseh.

By the coasts thereof round about.] That is, a description of its bounds on all sides.

According to their families.] Which was divided among as many families as were in that tribe.

Ver. 21. Jericho.] Having given a description of the bounds of the country, he sets down the principal cities in it. The first of which was well known, viz. Jericho; the territory of which remained, though the city itself was destroyed. And perhaps there were 19 And the border passed along to the side of Beth-hoglah northward; and the outgoings of the border were at the north bay of the salt sea at the south end of Jordan: this was the south coast.

20 And Jordan was the border of it on the east side. This was the inheritance of the children of Benjamin, by the coasts thereof round about, according to their families.

21 Now the cities of the tribe of the children of Benjamin according to their families were Jericho, and Beth-hoglah, and the valley of Keziz,

22 And Beth-arabah, and Zemaraim, and Beth-el,

23 And Avim, and Parah, and Ophrah,

24 And Chephar-haamonai, and Ophni, and Gaba; twelve cities with their villages:

25 Gibeon, and Ramah, and Beeroth,

26 And Mizpah, and Chephirah, and Mozah,

27 And Rekem, and Irpeel, and Taralah, some houses there, though without walls or gates; which seem to be the only things which Joshua commanded should not be built (vi. 26).

Beth-hoglah.] A city near to Jericho; not far from the river Jordan.

Valley of Keziz.] Rather, Emer-Keziz; for he speaks of a city, not of a valley. Or, it may be interpreted, Keziz in the valley; that is, in the plain of Jericho.

Ver. 22. Beth-arabah.] This city is reckoned to Judah (xvi. 61), being, it seems, in the confines of both tribes. It stood also in the plain of Jericho, signifying as much as dominus capitis, "a habitation in the fields!" for there were large fields about it, as Bochartus supposes; from whence a place in Assyria, for this reason, was called Orba, as he shows, lib. iv. Phalag. cap. 21.

Zemaraim.] A city, it is probable, built by Zemari, the tenth son of Canaan (Gen. x. 18). There was a mountain also called by this name, from this city, it is likely. For though it is said to be in Mount Ephraim, 2 Chron. xiii. 14, it might also, in part, belong to Benjamin, as Betharabah and the next cities did belong to two tribes.

Bethel.] A city in the confines of the tribe of Ephraim and of Benjamin, which seems to have belonged to both.

Ver. 23. Arim, and Parah, and Ophrah.] We know no more of these cities but their names.

Ver. 24. Chephar-haamonai, and Ophni. These also are unknown cities.

Gaba.] This is often named in Scripture, and called Gibeah, being that place where the foul fact was committed which almost ruined this tribe (Judg. xix.). And is called Gibeah of Saul, because it was his native country, where he made his residence after he was king (1 Sam. x. 26). And it was one of the cities of the priests (Josh. xxi. 17).

These cities.] Which seem to have been in the eastern part of that country.

Ver. 25. The first of these is well-known from the story of its ancient inhabitants, related in the ninth chapter of this book. It was also a city of the priests (xxi. 17), and seated on a hill, as its very name imports. Ramah also was an eminent city on the north side of Jerusalem, as Bethlehem was on the south. So that Jerusalem was in the road from the one to the other; as appears from the man that went from Bethlehem-Judah to Ramah (Judg. xix. 2. 11. 13).

Beeroth also is notorious upon this account, that it
CHAPTER XIX.

1 The lot of Simeon, 10 of Zebulun, 17 of Issachar, 24 of Asher, 32 of Naphthali, 40 of Dan. 49 The children of Israel give an inheritance to Joshua.

1 And the second lot came forth to Simeon, even for the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families: and their inheritance was within the inheritance of the children of Judah. 2 And they had in their inheritance Beersheba, Sheba, and Moladah, with their villages. This is the inheritance of the children of Benjamin according to their families.

Ver. 1. The second lot came forth to Simeon, both the LXX. and the Vulgar leave out the latter part of these words, as if they were superfluous; and only say, "the second lot came forth to Simeon." But I suppose the words following in the Hebrew are intended to show, that though their inheritance was within that of the tribe of Judah (as the next word tells us), yet those cities were not all that were given to this tribe, but they had another share by lot that fell to them: and God disposed it so, that the very next lot to Benjamin came up for them: Simeon being the eldest son of Jacob that was unprovided.

According to their families.] Which was divided by Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes, among their several families.

Their inheritance was within the inheritance of the tribe of Judah.] So we will translate it; for though the word in the Hebrew be betoch (in the midst) of the inheritance of Judah; yet it signifieth no more than within. For the lot of Simeon did not lie in the very heart (as we think), but outside of the country of Judah: from whose northern and western border some part was cut off, and given to the Simeonites; for the reason mentioned ver. 9.

Ver. 2. Beer-sheba, Sheba.] Or, rather, Beer-sheba, which is Sheba: for they were one and the same place; sometimes called at length Beer-sheba, and sometimes contracted into Sheba; nothing being more common than to cut off the beginning of the names of towns and places, as Bochathus hath shown in many instances, in his Paliog. lib. ii. cap. 24,
JOSHUA.

7 Ain, Remmon, and Ether, and Ashan; four cities and their villages:
8 And all the villages that were round about these cities to Baalath-beer, Ramath of the south. This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Simeon according to their families.
9 Out of the portion of the children of Judah was the inheritance of the children of Simeon: for the part of the children of Judah was too much for them; therefore the children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them.
10 ¶ And the third lot came up for the children of Zebulun according to their families: and the border of their inheritance was unto Sarid:
11 And their border went up toward the sea, and Maralah, and reached to Dabbasbeth, and reached to the river that is before Jokneam;
12 And turned from Sarid eastward toward the sumrising unto the border of Chisloth-tabor, and then goeth out to Daberath, and goeth up to Japhia, 13 And from thence passeth on along on the east to Gittah-hepher, to Atah-kazin, and goeth out to Remmon-methoar to Neah;
14 And the border compasseth it on the north

The children of Simeon had their inheritance within the inheritance of them. Within that lot, which was at first given to the tribe of Judah: yet not absolutely given, but so that if it appeared there was not sufficient for the rest of their brethren, and they had more than enough, that error should be corrected by taking something from them and giving it to another tribe, as it was now in this new allotment.

Ver. 10. Third lot came up for—Zebulun. He was not the next brother; for Issachar was born before him. But he is mentioned before Issachar, both in the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 13, and of Moses, Deut. xxxiii. 18.

Unto Sarid. No more is said of this place by Eusebius, but that it was Ἰσσαρ, "the bound or limit of Zebulun;" and St. Jerome saith the same. And, by what follows, it seems to have been the south-west border.

Ver. 11. Toward the sea. That is, the Mediterranean, which was in the west.

Maralah, and reached to Dabbasbeth: These were cities in the western borders, as appears by the following words.

The river that is before Jokneam. See xii. 22.

Ver. 12. Turned from Sarid eastward. This is a description of the south border; which went from Sarid in the west unto Jordan in the east.

Chisloth-tabor. A city near Mount Tabor in the tribe of Issachar, ver. 18. For as, on the west, the Zebulunites were contiguous to the tribe of Manasseh; so, towards the east, they were to the tribe of Issachar.

Daberath. A city also in the tribe of Issachar (xxi. 29).

Japhia. It is uncertain were this city was, though some think it to be the strong city which Josephus calls Japha (lib. ii. De Bello Jud. cap. 25), and places it in Galilee near Jotapata.

Ver. 13. Passeth on along on the east to Gittah-hepher. This seems to be a description of the eastern border. We read of the land of Hepher, 1 Kings iv. 10, which was near the sea of Galilee. There this city was, in which Jonah the prophet was born (2 Kings xiv. 25).

Ilath-kazin. This city, it is likely, was upon the same sea of Galilee, called Gennesaret; which the Vulgar calls Thracasin.

Geth out to Remmon-methoar to Nejah. Here the eastern border ended (for that is meant by the phrase goeth out), at the sea of Gennesaret. So Josephus expressly affirms (see Gen. xlix. 13).

Ver. 14. Compasseth it on the north side of Hannath. Here begins the description of the northern border; which, from the last named place, went in a bending line towards Hannath; a city, it is supposed, in this tribe.

Outgoings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el. Here the northern border ended. But we know no side to Hamathon: and the outgoings thereof are in the valley of Jiphthah-el:

15 And Kattath, and Nahallah, and Shimron, and Idalah, and Beth-lehem: twelve cities with their villages.

16 This is the inheritance of the children of Zebulun according to their families, these cities with their villages.

17 ¶ And the fourth lot came out to Issachar, for the children of Issachar according to their families.

18 And their border was toward Jezreel, and Chesulloth, and Shunem.

19 And Haphrah, and Shihon, and Anaharath, and 20 And Rabbith, and Kishion, and Abez,

21 And Remeth, and En-gannim, and En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez; more of this valley of Jiphthah-el, than that it was in the tribe of Asher, in the confines of this tribe (ver. 27).

Ver. 15. Kattath, &c.] It is not certain whether these cities belonged to Zebulun, or are set down as places upon which this tribe bordered. Of the first two I can give no account; but we read of Shimron as a principal city, which had a king in it conquered by Joshua (see xii. 20.) And Idalah is mentioned by St. Jerome (De locis Hebraicis), and called Jadelas: as if it were compounded of ja'd (which signifies a place, Dent. xxv. 19), and ela (a goddess), being the place where Venus was worshipped, as Bechardus conjectures, lib. i. Canaan, cap. 3. As for Beth-lehem, we are not to take it for the place where our Saviour was born; which is called Bethlehem-Judah, to distinguish it from this, which was far from it.

Twelve cities] Here are more cities than twelve: therefore some of them are mentioned only as the boundaries of this country. There is no doubt but those mentioned ver. 13, were in this tribe; and many think those five here mentioned in this were also. Jokneam likewise belonged to it; but which were the rest to make up the number twelve cannot be determined.

Ver. 16.] That is, these were the bounds of it; but all the cities belonging to it are not here set down: for we read of two, Kattath and Dimnah (xxi. 31, 35), which are not here named. And, indeed, twelve cities do not seem sufficient for sixty thousand men (Num. xxv. 27); therefore they were only the principal; and all, perhaps, that the measurers of the land had noted in their book.

Ver. 17.] Thus far there is some kind of order observed in these lots: Issachar being brother to Zebulun by the same mother.

Ver. 18. Jezreel] This was one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel in aftertimes (1 Kings xxvii. 17), which Elishua and St. Jerome placed in the tribe of Manasseh; but ought to be accounted belonging to this tribe, as the next place is agreed to be. There was another in the tribe of Judah (xxv. 56).

Chesulloth. Mentioned ver. 12, which both the aforementioned places in the tribe of Issachar, under the name of Acheseloth.

Shunem.] Where that noble lady lived who entertained Eliah at her house (2 Kings iv. 8, 12). And where Abishag, the wife of David, in his old age, was born, (1 Kings i. 3).

Ver. 19. Hopkrim, and Shihon, and Anaharath.] He doth not describe the borders on all sides of this tribe; but only sets down some principal cities: for it lying between Manasseh and Zebulun, the situation of it was sufficiently known. And they do but guess, who say these six cities named in the foregoing verse and in this were in the southern border.

Ver. 20.] These three cities, and the next two that follow, ver. 21, they will have to constitute the western border.

Ver. 21.] Remeth, and En-gannim.] Here, as I said, they imagine the western border ended.

En-haddah, and Beth-pazzez.] These two, and the three next, ver. 22, they will have to be the northern border.

Ver. 22. The coast reacheth to Tabor.] This is, that northern border; for Mount Tabor was in the north; and this city was hard by it, and received its name from the mount, or gave its name to it.

Shahazimah, and Beth-shemesh.] Here ended the northern border. There was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Naphtali (ver. 38), and another in the tribe of Judah (xxi. 10).

Their border were at Jordan.] This makes it probable the former account of its other borders is not true; because it leaves no city for the eastern border near Jordan, nor any for the middle of the country.

Sixteen cities.] This shows that Tabor was a city; otherwise there would be but fifteen.

Ver. 23.] These were their principal cities; but it is likely there were others: for we read of two not here mentioned, xxi. 29, 29. Dabareh and Jaromath; yet there are but the children of Jotham is but another name for Remeth, here mentioned, ver. 21, which to me doth not seem probable.

Ver. 24.] No reason can be given for this order; unless it be, that God was pleased to place this tribe, being descended from the handmaid of Leah, not far from Zebulun, one of Leah's sons. As for Gad, the elder brother of Asher, he was provided for before, on the other side of Jordan.

Ver. 25.] We know no more of the first three of these cities than their names. But the last of them was very considerable; mention being made of the king of Acsaphsh, xi. 1. xii. 20. The first of them also we find was a Levitical city (xxi. 31), called Hukok, in 1 Chron. vi. 75. It appears, likewise, by the mention of Carmel in the next verse, unto which this border reacheth, that these cities lay in the west near the Mediterranean Sea.

Ver. 26. Alalamelech, and Amad, and Mishpel; and reacheth to Carmel westward.] Or, by the sea, not far from Polemais; to distinguish it from the other Carmel, in the tribe of Judah, near Hebron (see xv. 55). Here the great prophet Elijah sometimes dwelt, and confuted the Baalities by a stupendous miracle. But ley of Jiphthah-el toward the north side of Beth-emek, and Neiel, and goeth out to Cabul on the left hand.
28 And Hebron, and Rehob, and Hammon, and Kanah, even unto great Zidon; 29 And then the coast turneth to Ramah, and to the strong city Tyre; and the coast turneth to Hosah; and the outgoings thereof are at the sea from the coast to Achzib:

we are as ignorant of the three cities mentioned in this verse, as we are of the other in the foregoing.

To Sihor-Libneath] Whether this was a city (some fathers, Polenialis, or a promontory, or a muddy river (for there are these different opinions about it), I cannot determine.

Ver. 27. Turneth toward the sunrising] It turned from the sea towards the east; and so northward, bending towards the west again. For there are no borders or sides of this tribe described; but from the south part of the sea it turned eastward, and then northward, in the form of a bow, towards the north part of the same sea, where Zidon was (ver. 28).

To Beth-dagon] There was a place of this name mentioned before in the tribe of Judah, xv. 41. where it is thought there was a famous temple of Dagon, the god of the Philistines.

To Zebulun, and to the valley of Jiphthah-el] And so touched upon the north border of the tribe of Zebu-lun; in which the valley of Jiphthah-el lay (see ver.
14).

Towards the north side of Beth-emek and Neiel.] Where these were, is not known. Only Eusebius and St. Jerome say, Beth-emek lay in a valley, or low place in this tribe; as the word seems to import.

(called the left hand) of this city, which lay in the tribe of Asher, this border ended. Some have been so frivolous as hence to argue, that this book was written long after Joshua's time; because the land of Cabul (1 Kings i. 13) was not known till the days of Solomon, when Hiram gave this name to the land, which Solomon presented him withal. As if there were no difference between the land and the city of Cabul: when one of them was a little region, containing twenty towns, and the other a small place in the country of Asher; both of them in the tribe of Asher. They are plainly distinguished by Josephus, who calls one of them γυναὶ Χαλεμᾶ, "the land of Cabul:" and the other χαλεμᾶς, "the village of Cal-bul:" as Huetius hath observed, proos. iv. Demonstr.
Evang. p. 186.

Ver. 28. Hebron.] Called Julian by the LXX. and by the Vulgar Alphabet, to distinguish it, I suppose, from that Hebron in the land of Judah.

Rehob.] There were two cities of this name in this tribe (see ver. 30). One of them was a Levitical city (xxi. 31), and the Cannanites kept possession either of that or the other (Judg. i. 31).

Hammon.] There was a Levitical city of this name in the tribe of Naphtali (1 Chron. vi. 76), called Hammothor in xxi. 32. of this book.

Kanaa.] There were two cities of this name; one in the upper Galilee, which was Kanah the greater; and the other in the lower Galilee, called Kanah the less. He speaks here of the greater, which was near to Sidon. The lesser was that wherein our Saviour turned water into wine, and of which Nathanael and the Syrophcenician woman were.

Great Zidon.] See before concerning this city, xi. 8.

Ver. 29. Another city on the northern part of the Mediterranean sea.

30 Ummah also, and Aphek, and Rehob: twenty and two cities with their villages.
31 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Asher according to their families, these cities with their villages.
32 The sixth lot came out to the children of Naphtali, even for the children of Naphtali according to their families.
33 And their coast was from Heleh, from

To the strong city Tyre] This translation is questionable: for we never read one word of the city Tyre (unless it be here) until the days of David;
though we often read of Sidon in the books of Moses;
even in the prophesy of Jechon. And, as Boeortus observes, Homer himself, who speaks frequently of Sidon and the Sidonians, never names Tyre (lib. iv.
Phleg. cap. 35). Therefore, it is highly probable, some other place is meant by Tzor (as our margin notes the word is in the Hebrew), which was a fenced city, as we render the word here translated strong (ver. 35). And there were several cities, perhaps, called by this name of Tzor or Tyre, besides that famous one in future times; particularly Palatyrus; as much as to say old Tyre. And it is no improbable conjecture of Campegius Vitrunga, that into these two places, Sidon and Tzor, many of the people of Canaan fled, to secure themselves when Joshua invaded them: for Tzor signifies not only a rock, but any strong fortified place: from whence it is possible the Latin word turris, and then our English tower is derived.
Certain it is, that these two were famous cities, بطنه على مرج، as Strabo calls them, lib. xvi. where he saith they were so anciently, and not only in his time; insomuch, that it was uncertain which was the metropolis of the Phenicians. But it is certain he speaks of the New Tyre, which was built in an island; but the old one was on the continent (see his Observations Suers, lib. i. cap. 1).

Turneth to Hosah.] Declined a little towards a city of this name.

The outgoings thereof are at the sea, from the coast of Achzib.] It ended at the country which belonged to Achzib; for so hebèb (which we here translate coast) signifies. In proper speaking it signifies a cord, whereby ground was measured; and thence was used to signify the portion of ground itself, which was measured by that cord or line. Thus we read of He-bel Argob, the region of Argob, Deut. iii. 13. and He-bel Hajam, the region of the sea, Zeph. ii. 5. Achzib, according to St. Jerome, is that place, which, by Pil-ny and others, was called in aftertimes Eedippa.

Ver. 30. Unnamah also, and Aphek and Rehob.] It is probable these were three cities in the heart of the country of Ascher.

Twenty and two cities] There are more than this number here mentioned, though we do not reckon Carmel nor Jiphthah-el, one of which was a mountain, the other a valley. Therefore some of them were only the boundaries of this tribe, but did not belong to their possession.

Ver. 31.] That is, these were the most eminent cities, though it is probable there were some other. For we read of one called Abdon, xxi. 30. not here mentioned.

Ver. 32.] Here the younger son of Bilhah, the handmaid of Rachel, is preferred before the elder, who was Dan (Gen. xxx. 6. 8), as Zebulun was before Issachar. Such was the method of Divine Providence in that nation, to show them that they ought not to value themselves too highly, as they were prone to do, upon their privileges.

Ver. 33.] Their coast was from Heleh, &c.] He doth Allon to Zaanannim, and Adami, Nekeb, and Jabneul, unto Lakkum: and the outgoings thereof were at Jordan: 31 And then the coast turneth westward to Aznoth-tabor, and goeth out from thence to Iluk, and reacheth to Zebulun on the south side, and reacheth to Asher on the west side, and to Judah upon Jordan towards the sunrising.

32 And the fenced cities are Ziddim, and Hazor, and Hammath, Rakkath, and Chinnereth, 33 and Adamah, and Ramah, and Hazor, 34 and Kedesh, and Edrei, and En-hazor, not say what coast this was; but by what follows, it appears to be the northern border where these cities were situated, near Lebanon and Sidon, and the rest of the northern part of Asher's country: for Naphtali comprehended the upper Galilee.

The outgoings thereof were at Jordan: this border ended at this river; and at the very fountain thereof, which was at the foot of Libannus.

Ver. 31. Turneth westward to Aznoth-tabor, &c. The northern border began at the former of these cities; and ended at the latter.

To Zebulun on the south side. Touchéd on the confines of the tribe of Zebulun; so that the north side of Zebulun was the south side of Naphtali.

To Asher on the west side. This is a short account of their western border, which went as far as to the borders of the tribe of Asher.

To Judah upon Jordan toward the sunrising. It was not near Judah, there being several tribes between them. Therefore the meaning is, this tribe had communication with that of Judah by the river Jordan, so the word upon in our translation must be interpreted (though there be no preposition at all in the Hebrew before Jordan), which river afforded them convenience of carrying merchandises to Judah, by bringing them from thence. And thus some think the prophecy of Moses was fulfilled (Deut. xxxii. 23). Possess thou the west and the south. Which doth not signify that they had any land in the south; but that they trafficked with it, by the means of Jordan.

Ver. 35. The fenced cities are Ziddim, &c. These were northern cities, it appears by that mentioned in the last, Hamath, which was the utmost bounds of the land of Israel northward (see Num. xxxi. 21, xxxiv. 8, 1 Kings viii. 65). It seems to have had its name from the youngest son of Canaan, who, it is likely, built it, as his eldest son did Sidon (Gen. x. 18). It continued a famous city a long time; for in the days of David, we read how the king of it cunningly made his peace with him by a great present (2 Sam. viii. 9, &c.).

Rabbath, which follows that, is, in the opinion of some of the Jews, the same with Tiberias. So the author of the book De Cippis Herbaeis, set forth by Hottinger. Whence the Talmudists, as he observes, say, Rakath is Zipporia; which was called Rakath, because it was seated upon a bank of a river. It was also called Mesia, and at last Tiberias: though other Jewish authors make Rakath different from that city.

Chinnereth. A place upon this sea of Tiberias; in which there were fine gardens, and a kind of paradise. Whence it was called Geneseret; as much as to say, the gardens of princes (Gennoth-Sarim). And it had the name of Chinnereth, from its sweetness and pleasures, as the Jews say (Cod. Mogulli); “Kinnereth is Ginereth. And why is it called Chinnereth? because its fruits are as sweet to the taste, as the sound of a harp is to the ear” (see Hottinger in his annot. on the forenamed hook, p. 36).

38 And Iron, and Migdal-el, Horem, and Beth-anath, and Beth-shemesh; nineteen cities with their villages.

39 This is the inheritance of the tribe of the children of Naphtali according to their families, the cities and their villages.

40 And the seventh lot came out for the tribe of the children of Dan according to their families.

41 And the coast of their inheritance was Zoarah, and Eshtol, and Beth-shemesh.

42 And Shaalabbin, and Ajalon, and Jethlah,

As for the first two cities, Ziddim and Zer, I can say nothing of them.

Ver. 36. We may guess where these cities were by the last of them, Hazor, to which they were neighbours (see concerning it, xi. 1).

Ver. 37. The first of these was a Levitical city (xxii. 32), in which that famous captain, Barak, was born, Judges iv. 6, where it is called Kedesh-Naphtali, to distinguish it from those of that name in other tribes. Of the other two tribes we know nothing.

Ver. 38. Iron, &c. and Beth-shemesh. Every one knows there was another Beth-shemesh in the tribe of Judah; and that this city and Beth-anath the children of Naphtali could not conquer (Judg. i. 23). But we know no more of them, nor of the rest; save only that Euesibus says, there was a large village, called Migdal-el, between Dora and Pulemains.

Nineteen cities with their villages. Six of which were fenced cities, certainly belonging to this tribe; and there are as many more mentioned as make up twenty-three. Some of which therefore must be accounted as succeeding cities; or only large villages, and not properly cities.

Ver. 39. This must be understood (as in the account of the forementioned tribes) of the principal cities; for there were more besides these, as appears from xxi. 32, where Hammoth-dar and Kartan are numbered among the Levitical cities in this tribe, which are not mentioned here.

Ver. 40. Seventh lot came out for—Dan. They were the only remaining tribe that was to be provided for.

Ver. 41. He doth not describe their lot by its borders; but mentions the cities that were in it. Some of which at first were given to Judah; out of whose share, it being too large, some cities were taken for the Danites, as others were for the Simeonites. And it is certain the first two of these fell to Judah, in the first division of the land (xv, 33). Both very eminent places, for the birth, and burial, and mighty motions of Samson; for at Zorah he was born (Judg. xiii. 2), between Zorah and Eshtol he was buried (Judg. xvi. ult.), and here the Spirit of God began to move him, at certain times (xiii. 25). It is probable, also, that Irshechem was in the tribe of Judah at the first; it being of the same signification with Beth-shemesh for one signifies the city of the sun; the other, the house, or place of the sun.

Ver. 42. Sorek, and Zenan. Which the Amorites kept in their possession, Judg. i. 35, where by a small change of letters, it is called Shaalbin; and in some copies of the LXX. translated εν τω ξυιναι δοκεητον, and in others εν Γειανα. And in our present LXX. both these are retained. For a fox in the Arabic language is called ihlab, and in the Phenician (which is half Arabic) soinab; as Bochartus observes in his Hierozon, part. i. lib. iii, cap. 15. and in his Cumaan, lib. i. cap. 34. p. 684.

Ajalon.] Another city which the Amorites kept,
And Elon, and Timnathah, and Ekron,
And Eltekeh, and Gibbethon, and Baalah,
And Jehud, and Bene-berak, and Gath-rimon,
And Me-jarkon, and Rakkon, with the border before Japho.
And the coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them: therefore the children of Dan went up to fight against Lemosh, and took it, and smote it with the edge of the sword, and possessed it, and dwelt therein, and called Lemosh, Dan, after the name of Dan their father.

from them, as we find in the same place, Judg. i. 35. And was one of the Levitical cities (xxi. 23), and that famous place mentioned x. 13.

Jehovah.] We know no more than that it was a city in this tribe.

Ver. 43.] It is certain that the last of these three cities was at first given to Judah (xxv. 45). But Timnathah was not the same with Timmam in the same tribe (xx. 10. 57), but quite different from it; as Gib- eath, I observed in the foregoing chapter, was from Geba, for Samson went down to this city Timmam (Judg. xiv. 5), which shows it was in a valley; whereas Judah went up to Timmam to shear his sheep (Gen. xxxviii. 11. 13), which shows it was upon a hill. Concerning Elon I can say nothing, unless it be the same with Holon in the tribe of Judah (xxv. 51.)

Ver. 44.] Some think that the first of these is the same with that city in the tribe of Judah, called Eltekeh, xxv. 59, and the last the same with that called Baalah, ver. 29. As for Gibbethon, the Danites seem not to have got possession of it, or to have lost it again; for it was in the hands of the Philistines after the days of David (1 Kings xxv. 27. xvi. 15), and yet one of the Levitical cities (Josh. xvi. 21. 23).

Ver. 45.] Where Jehovah was I find not; but Bopa- zai is mentioned by Eusebius as a village near Azotus (or Ashdod) and St. Jerome saith in his time was called Berna. Which may incline us to his opinion, that Geth-rimon was no other than the city of Gath, so often mentioned in Scripture as one of the principal cities of the Philistines. It is reckoned among the Levitical cities xxvi. 21, as Gibbethon was ver. 44, though in the hands of the Philistines.

Ver. 46. Me-jarkon and Rakkon.] It is not certain where these places were, but very likely near to the place next mentioned.

With the border before Japho.] This place was afterward called Joppa, being the principal port town in all Judea (mentioned by Pompon. Mela, Strabo, and Pliny), and continues so to this day, retaining the name of Japha, which in Hebrew signifies fair or beautiful. It is not certain that it was a part of the tribe of Dan, though Eusebius calls it a sea-town of the lot of Dan; for these words may signify no more but that their portion comprehended the border which lay before this place.

Ver. 47. The coast of the children of Dan went out too little for them.] These words, too little, are not in the Hebrew, where there is nothing answering to them. But the words run thus, the coast of the children of Dan went out from them; that is, they were dispossessed of it in some parts by their powerful neighbours the Amorites, who forced them into the mountains, and would not let them dwell in the valley (Judg. i. 34). This put them to such straits, that they were constrained to enlarge their border some other way, which they did by the means following. I shall only further note, that this is no strange phrase; for in the year of jubilee lands are said to go out, when they returned to their first owners, from the present possessors (Lev. xxv. 28. 30. 31. 33).

Lemosh.] A city not far from Jordan, called Laish, in the book of Judges, before it was taken by the Danites. In aftertimes, when it fell into the hands of the Romans, it was called Panessa; and made the metropolis of the peoples and Trachonitis. And from Philip, also, son of Herod the Great, who very much enlarged and adorned it, it was called Caesarea Philippi, in honour of Tiberius Caesar.

Smote it—and dwelt therein.] Were not disturbed in their possession.

Called Lemosh, Dan.] Thus conquerors were wont to change the names of places which they subdued. This was done after Joshua's death; and is related more largely in the book of Judges, ch. xviii, where there is an account of the whole expedition. From whence some argue this book was not written by Joshua; whereas no more can be inferred from it than that, in aftertimes, Ezra, or some other, thought good to put in this verse here, to complete the account of the Danites' possessions. But any one may see, as Huetius observes, that if this verse were taken away, all that is said of this tribe coheres perfectly; and there is no breach at all in the context of the foregoing with the following verse after this. Which is an argument, that this short account of their taking Lemosh were not the words of the writer of this book, but inserted afterward by some other person.

For the land was taken away, this relation of the Danites' lot would be more like the account of the lot of all the rest.

Ver. 48.] The number of them is not set down, as in the foregoing tribes; of which it is to no purpose to inquire the reason.

Ver. 49.] When they had made an end of dividing the land] That is, after every tribe had their portion assigned to them. Gave an inheritance to Joshua] We cannot but observe the wonderful modesty of this great man, who received his portion last of all; and then, not by lot, but by their gift; who were already possessed of the whole land.

Ver. 50.] According to the word of the Lord they gave him the city which he asked.] God, indeed, had ordered that he should have a portion, and that he should choose it; but he was content to stay for it till every body else was served. We do not expressly read of this command; but many things were said and done which are not recorded. And he being as faithful and upright as Caleb (and, besides, chosen to be the captain of God's people), we cannot but think, that when God ordered what Caleb should have, he gave the same direction about Joshua. And so much is implied in those words of Caleb himself, when he demanded his portion of Joshua (xiv. 6). "Thou knowest the thing the Lord said unto Moses the man of God concerning me and thee in Kadesh-barnes?"
CHAPTER XX.

1 God commandeth, 7 and the children of Israel appoint the six cities of refuge.

5 And if the avenger of blood pursue after him, then they shall not deliver the slayer up into his hand; because he smote his neighbour unwittingly and hated him not beforehand.

CHAPTER XX.

Ver. 1. The Lord—spake unto Joshua.] From the tabernacle, at the door of which he, and Eleazar, and the princes had been making a division of the land; as the last verse of the foregoing chapter tells us.

Ver. 2. 'Appoint out for you cities of refuge.'] This was the proper time for it; when they were all met together to receive their several portions of land, after an exact survey of the country.

Ver. 3. That the slayer that killeth any person unwares may flee thither:] Such places, every body knows, there were among the heathen; but commonly they were their temples, and their altars, as many have observed; particularly Joh. Genius lately in his book De Vietinis Humanis, par. iii. cap. 21, p. 453, &c. But there were also some cities that had this privilege, as Dillherrus (who thinks herein the gentiles imitated the Jews) observes out of Tacitus, lib. iii. Annal, where he saith the principal cities of Greece contended before Tiberius about this matter, De Jure Asylumorum (see Dissert. De Caccozella Gentilium, cap. 5).

They shall be your refuge] Protect such persons from him who studied to avenge the blood of the slain. Concerning whom, see Num. xxxv. 12.

Ver. 4. Shall stand at the entering:] Desiring to be admitted and protected there.

Shall declare his cause in the ears of the elders:] That is, the judges, who sat at the gate before mentioned (Deut. xvi. 18).

Shiloh before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. So they made an end of dividing the country.

Even Timnah-schereth] He did not choose the best place in all the country, but a convenient place in his own tribe; which was seated on the north side of a hill called Gaash; as we read in the latter end of this hook.

He built the city, and dwell therein.] Repaired it, I suppose (for in all likelihood there was a city there before), and made a convenient habitation for his family and kindred. But we read nothing of them; for as he did not affect to be himself king of Con-anam, so he contented himself with a little, and made no large provision for his posterity. We have no mention made of his sons or daughters; but (as Con-} rad, Pellicanus speaks) all the Israelites were his children.

Ver. 51. These are the inheritances, &c.] It is usual after so long an account, to recapitulate in what they had done, and by what authority; which he doth in this verse.

So they made an end of dividing the country.] Every tribe had the place of their settlement appointed to them, to their satisfaction; so that there was no further division made of the land.

They shall take him into the city:] Being satisfied he was such a person as he pretended.

Give him a place:] Assign a convenient habitation for him; these cities being appointed by God for that purpose, and given unto these who inhabited them on this condition, that they should entertain such persons when they fled to them.

Ver. 5. If the avenger of blood pursue after him, Desiring he might be delivered up into his hands.

Then they shall not deliver the slayer up:] But defend him from his assailants.

Because he smote his neighbour unwittingly,] It was a casual slaughter, without any design of doing him hurt, as far as appeared to them. If the avenger pursued the slayer so closely, that they had not time to examine the matter at the gate of the city, they were not to let him stand there; but take him in (and afterward hear his cause and judge it), lest the avenger should kill him before he was admitted into their city.

Ver. 6. Until he stand before the congregation for judgment:] The avenger might bring him before another tribunal, to be tried whether he killed the man by chance or not (see Num. xxxv. 21, 25).

Until the death of the high priest:] If that court found him not guilty of wilful murder, he was restored to the city of refuge; but confined to live there till the death of the high priest (see in the same place).

Then shall the slayer return,] See Num. xxxv. 28. Ver. 7.] It is commonly observed, that as these three cities were seated on high and eminent places, that they might be seen afar off; so they were at such a distance from each other, that all the country might more easily have the benefit of one or other of them.

Vol. 1.—126
CHAPTER XXI.

1 Eight and forty cities given by lot, out of the other tribes, unto the Levites. 43 God gave the land and rest unto the Israelites, according to his promise.

2 Then came near the heads of the fathers of the Levites unto Eleazar the priest, and unto Joshua the son of Nun, and unto the heads of the fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel;
3 And they spake unto them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan, saying, The Lord commanded by the hand of Moses to give us cities to dwell in, with the suburbs thereof for our cattle.
4 And the children of Israel gave unto the Levites out of their inheritance, at the commandment of the Lord, these cities and their suburbs.
5 And the lot came out for the families of the Kohathites: and the children of Aaron the priest, which were of the Levites, had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, and out of the tribe of Simeon, and out of the tribe of Benjamin, thirteen cities.

Ver. 3. These cities were appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them, that whosoever killeth any person at unwares might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.

Ver. 4. The lot came out for the families of the Kohathites.] After the cities were set out, which should belong to them, then they were divided by lot among the several families of the Levites; as the whole land was among the tribes. And the first lot came out for the noblest family in the tribe of Levi; for Moses and Aaron were descended from Kohath.

Ver. 5. The children of Aaron the priest.] The family of Aaron being priests were the principal among the Levites; and therefore were first and very honourably provided for.

Ver. 6. Had by lot out of the tribe of Judah, &c.] It was by a special providence, that the share which fell to the priests was in those tribes that were nearest to the city; which God intended should be the fixed place of his worship and service in future times; that the priests might be ready to give their attendance there, without much trouble.

Ver. 7. The children of Kohath.] All these descendants were not priests, but Aaron and his family alone; the rest were bare Levites.

Ver. 8. On the other side Jordan by Jericho eastward, they assigned Bezer in the wilderness upon the plain out of the tribe of Reuben, and Ramoth in Gilead out of the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan out of the tribe of Manasseh.

Ver. 9. These were the cities appointed for all the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them, that whosoever killeth any person at unwares might flee thither, and not die by the hand of the avenger of blood, until he stood before the congregation.

The heads of the fathers of the Levites.] So the princes of the several tribes (who divided the land, together with Joshua and Eleazar) are called, xiv, 1, and in the conclusion of this verse. And, therefore, the chief persons descended from Kohath, Gershon, and Merari (who were the fathers of the Levites), are here meant by the "heads of the fathers" of that tribe.

The command is registered in Numb. xxxv. 2, &c., and is set down before the mention of cities of refuge (which are commanded in the following part of the chapter), though, it seems, that command was executed before this.

Ver. 3. Not only Joshua, Eleazar, and the princes, but all the people of Israel acknowledged this obligation, which God had laid upon them; and accordingly these words import, that the people separated so many cities as he commanded by Moses (which were to be forty and eight, Numb. xxxv. 7), for the habitation of the Levites. Which cities are here named, and distributed among them in this chapter.

Ver. 6. Among the sons of Levi, Gershon is mentioned as the eldest, Exod. vi. 16, Numb. iii. 17, but the lot came up first to the children of Kohath, the priests being descended from him.

Ver. 7. The children of Merari by their families had out of the tribe of Reuben, and out of the tribe of Gad, and out of the tribe of Zebulun, twelve cities.

8 And the children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites these cities with their suburbs, as the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses.

9 And they gave out of the tribe of children of Judah, and out of the tribe of the children of Simeon, these cities which are here mentioned by name.

10 Which the children of Aaron, being of the families of the Kohathites, who were of the children of Levi, had: for their's was the first lot.

11 And they gave them the city of Arba the father of Anak, which city is Hebron, in the hill country of Judah, with the suburbs thereof round about it.

12 But the fields of the city, and the villages thereof, gave they to Caleb the son of Jephunneh for his possession.

13 Thus they gave to the children of Aaron the priest Hebron with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Libnah with her suburbs,

14 And Jattir with her suburbs, and Eshe'moa with her suburbs,

Ver. 7.] This is only a general account of the tribes in which their several lots fell, and of the number of cities bestowed on their several families.

Ver. 8. The children of Israel gave by lot unto the Levites] The children of Israel, as I said before, gave them; and the lot divided them.

As the Lord commanded—Moses.] Who ordered both how many cities they should have, and how large the suburbs of them should be (see Num. xxxiv. 3, 4).

Ver. 9.] Here now follows a particular account of the names of those cities, which were said before in general to have been given out of these two tribes. Which are put together, because the lot of Simeon was taken out of the lot of Judah.

Ver. 10. The Kohathites.] One of the families of the Kohathites, and the eldest of them; for they descended from Amram, the eldest son of Kohath (Exod. vi. 18. Numb. iii. 19).

Their's was the first lot.] They had the honour to be first provided for, as was said before, ver. 4.

Ver. 11. And they] That is, Eleazar, Joshua, and the princes.

Hebron.] See of this city, xiv. 15. xv. 13.

Ver. 12.] The priests had only the city and suburbs, which were their possession, as much as the fields and villages were Caleb's, on whom they were bestowed before (xiv. 13, &c.).

Ver. 13. They gave to the children of Aaron the priest Hebron—to be a city of refuge.] It was given them with this condition, that they who slew a man unwares should be entertained here, and have a place given them to live securely among them (xx. 4).

Libnah with her suburbs.] This is to be understood to belong to them no otherwise than Hebron did, unto which they had no right beyond the city and suburbs: and, therefore, the fields and the villages of Libnah they had nothing to do withal; and the same is to be noted of all the following cities of the priests.

Ver. 14.] These are mentioned as belonging to Judah, xxviii. 50.

15 And Holon with her suburbs, and Debir with her suburbs,

16 And Ain with her suburbs, and Juttah with her suburbs, and Beth-shemesh with her suburbs; nine cities out of those two tribes.

17 And out of the tribe of Benjamin, Gibea with her suburbs, Geba with her suburbs, 18 Anathoth with her suburbs, and Almon with her suburbs; four cities.

19 All the cities of the children of Aaron, the priests, were thirteen cities with their suburbs.

20 And the families of the children of Kohath, the Levites which remained of the children of Kohath, even they had the cities of their lot out of the tribe of Ephraim.

21 For they gave them Shechem with her suburbs in mount Ephraim, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Gezer with her suburbs, 22 And Kibzaim with her suburbs, and Bethhoron with her suburbs; four cities.

25 And out of the half tribe of Manassach, possessed of the two cities here mentioned, by the invasions of their enemies (who perhaps demolished them), these two others were given in lieu of them.

Two cities.] Which was a just proportion to the other whole tribes, who gave four.

Ver. 26. For the families of the children of Kohath] Who were not of the children of Aaron, the priests (ver. 5).

Ver. 27. Gershon, of the families of the Levites, out of the other half tribe of Manasseh] Which had their inheritance on the other side of Jordan.

Golan in Bashan] See xx. 8. From whence the neighbouring country was Gaulonitis.

Beesh-terah] Called Ashtaroth in 1 Chron. vi. 71, by a very light change, only leaving out the first letter.

Two cities.] The same number that was given out of the other half of this tribe (ver. 25).

Dabareh] Not mentioned before in this book, but in 1 Chron. vi. 72.

Ver. 29. Jarmuth] Called Ramoth, 1 Chron. vi. 73.

En-gannim] See ch. xix. 21, called Anem, I Chron. vi. 73.

Abdon] Mentioned in that place in the Chronicles; but not in the nineteenth chapter of this book (see ver. 31, of that chapter).

Rehob] Mentioned there, and Josh. xix. 28.

Ver. 32. Kedesh in Galilee] See xx. 7.

Hammoth-dor] Called simply Hammath, xix. 35, and Hammon, I Chron. vi. 76.

Kortan] Called Kirjathaim in 1 Chron. vi. 76.

Three cities.] This being a smaller territory, it seems, than the rest of the tribes forementioned, who gave four.

Ver. 33.] As was said before, ver. 6.

Ver. 34. Merari, the rest of the Levites.] The remaining families of the Levites; for there were three heads of them; Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.

Out of the tribe of Zebulan, Jokneam—and Karlah] Of the former, see xix. 11, and of the latter, ver. 16.

to their families were thirteen cities with their suburbs.

31 ¶ And unto the children of the children of Merari, the rest of the Levites, out of the tribe of Zebulan, Jokneam with her suburbs, and Karlah with her suburbs,

33 And out of the tribe of Reuben, Bezer with her suburbs, and Jahazah with her suburbs,

35 And out of the tribe of Gad, Ramoth in Gilead with her suburbs, to be a city of refuge for the slayer; and Mahanaim with her suburbs,

40 So all the cities for the children of Merari by their families, which were remaining of the families of the Levites, were by their lot twelve cities.

41 All the cities of the Levites within the possession of the children of Israel were forty and eight cities with their suburbs.
CHAPTER XXII.

1 The two tribes and half with a blessing are sent home. 9 They build the altar of testimony in their journey.
11 The Israelites are offended thereat. 21 They give them good satisfaction.

1 Then Joshua called the Reubenites, and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh,
2 And said unto them, Ye have kept all that Moses the servant of the Lord commanded you, and have obeyed my voice in all that I commanded you:
3 Ye have not left your brethren these many days unto this day, but have kept the charge of the commandment of the Lord your God.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 1.] Who came as auxiliaries to their brethren when they passed over Jordan; as they had engaged to do, when they received their inheritance on the other side of it (i. 12—11, &c.).

Ver. 2.] Numb. xxxii. 29, &c. Deut. iii. 18, &c. In this and the following verses, he commands them for their obedience unto God and unto him; and for their fidelity to their promises; and their constancy and patience in their piety to God, and love to their brethren.

Ver. 3. Ye have not left your brethren these many days] Seven years (some think as many more) they had compacted in their territory as long as the war lasted with the Canaanites; yea, till they had seen their brethren settled in the lots fallen to them.

4 And now the Lord your God hath given rest unto your brethren, as he promised them: therefore now return ye, and get you unto your tents, and unto the land of your possession, which Moses the servant of the Lord gave you on the other side Jordan.

5 But take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law, which Moses the servant of the Lord charged you, to love the Lord your God.

But have kept the charge:] During which time they never refused what was expected from them for the help of their brethren (see xi. 18, xiv. 10). This was a great proof of their patient obedience, in staying so long from their wives and children.

Ver. 4. Now the Lord your God hath given rest unto your brethren,] Which he had done for them before, i. 13.

Tents:] So he calls their houses, because this was the common word used for a long time in the wilderness, to signify a habitation.

Unto the land of your possession.] It was but reasonable and just that they should go and enjoy what God had given them, now their brethren were in a quiet possession of their portion; and that their fidelity in performing their promise, should be rewarded with the like, in dismissing them, when they
God, and to walk in all his ways, and to keep his commandments, and to cleave unto him, and to serve him with all your heart and with all your soul.

6 So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away: and they went unto their tents.

7 ¶ Now to the one half of the tribe of Manasseh Moses had given possession in Bashan: but unto the other half thereof gave Joshua among their brethren on this side Jordan westward. And when Joshua sent them away also unto their tents, then he blessed them,

8 And he spake unto them, saying, Return with much riches unto your tents, and with very much cattle, with silver, and with gold, and with brass, and with iron, and with very much raiment: divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren.

9 ¶ And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh returned, and departed from the children of Israel out of Shiloah, which is in the land of Canaan, to go unto the country of Gilead, to the land of their possession, whereof they were possessed, according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

10 ¶ And when they came unto the borders of Jordan, that are in the land of Canaan, the had done their business. For they engaged to serve no longer, than till they had driven the Canaanites out of their country (Numb. xxxii. 21).

Ver. 5. Take diligent heed to do the commandment and the law.] That is, to observe all his precepts (as they had done this of aiding their brethren), and for that end, preserve in mind all that God had done for them (see Deut. iv. 9).

To love the Lord your God, &c.] Especially to worship the Lord alone with sincere affection; which Moses inculcated above all things, before he left them (Deut. vi. 13, 14. x. 13. xi. 32. xx. 9. xxx. 6. 20).

Ver. 6. So Joshua blessed them, and sent them away.] He not only praised and commended them; but dismissed them with a solemn prayer to God for his blessing upon them. And he seems first to have dismissed with his blessing the Reubenites and Gadites; and then to have blessed the Manassites by themselves. They went unto their tents.] In order to pack up their goods, and make themselves ready for their departure.

Ver. 7. To the one half of the tribe of Manasseh, &c.] This is repeated to show why he mentioned only half the tribe of Manasseh, ver. 1, and to introduce what follows.

When Joshua sent them away.] As he had done the Reubenites and Gadites.

Then he blessed them.] This seems to signify that he gave a peculiar blessing to the Manassites; that is, renewed his services, by some present which he made them; for so the word blessing (I observed before) sometimes signifies (2 Kings v. 15). And he did this the rather, because the Manassites were near of kin to the children of Ephraim (of which tribe he himself was), and were now to be separated from the rest of their brethren in Canaan.

Ver. 8. He spake unto them.] This speech seems to be directed to the Reubenites and Gadites, as well as to the Manassites; though they had a peculiar concern in it.

Return with much riches unto your tents, &c.] As much as to say, Part with your brethren contentedly and well-pleased; laden with the spoils which you have got in the wars against the people of Canaan. For they had their share in the prey, as well as the other seven tribes a half; and carried it away to their own country.

Divide the spoil of your enemies with your brethren.] He orders them, when they came home, to let those that stayed on the other side Jordan, to defend their wives, children, and cattle, to have a share in the spoil which they had gotten. For this was thought an equal thing by God himself in the war they had with the Midianites, before they came over Jordan; when twelve thousand went out to fight; who had one half of the spoil; the other half being divided among all the congregation that stayed at home (Numb. xxxi. 27). And it is very reasonable to think, that now the same proportion was observed; the forty thousand who went to help their brethren in the war, having one half of the spoil; and their brethren who stayed to guard their possession, the other half: so that the warriors had the far greater share, as there was reason, because they had hazarded their lives in the enterprise. But in David's time it was made a law, that they who went to fight, and that they stayed to guard the stuff, should have an equal share in the prey (1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25. see Gen. xiv. ult.).

Ver. 9.] This shows that he gave them all his blessing in Shiloh, where the sanctuary was; and sent them from thence, under the Divine protection, to their own country: which is here called the country of Gilead, because that was an eminent part of their country, divided between the children of God and Manasseh; and here comprehends all the rest of the land where the Reubenites lived.

Ver. 10. When they came unto the borders of Jordan.] Or, "they came" (for the word when is not in the Hebrew) unto the banks of that river.

In the land of Canaan.] This seems to import that they built the altar, mentioned in the end of the verse, before they went over Jordan, in the land of Canaan. Which is not at all likely; for it would not have answered their intention: which was to show, that Jordan did not make such a separation between them and their brethren, but that they were one people, and espoused the same things, as were the altar of God was in Shiloh. Therefore I take this to be a short manner of speech; signifying that they came to the borders of Jordan in the land of Canaan; and passed over into their own country on the other side of the river. And so the Hebrew word geillath (which we translate borders) seems to signify, a certain place near Jordan, to which they came. The Vulgar Latin translate it hepgis; the LXX. in the Vatican copy, retains the word ραββαλ (or Rabbalas, as other copies more truly have it), taking it for some noted place, which was near to their passage over Jordan.

Built there an altar by Jordan.] The word there hath made it thought that they built this altar in the land of Canaan before mentioned; but the particle with which relates to time as well as place, and may be translated then as well as there. Examples of which there are in Judg. v. 21. Prov. viii. 27. compared with ver. 30. Eccles. iii. 17. and most plainly, Isa. lxxxviii. 16. And thus it is to be here interpreted, that, before they went any farther, they stayed by Jordan till they had built this altar on the borders of their own country; for to the next verse teaches us to expand it, and will admit of no other sense; where it is said, they had "built an altar over against the land of Canaan."

A great altar to see to.] Which made a great show children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh built there an altar by Jordan, a great altar to see to.

11 ¶ And the children of Israel heard say, Behold, the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh have built an altar over against the land of Canaan, in the borders of Jordan, at the passage of the children of Israel.

12 And when the children of Israel heard of it, the whole congregation of the children of Israel gathered themselves together at Shiloh, to go up to war against them.

13 And the children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the half tribe of Manasseh, unto the land of Gilead, Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, being very high and conspicuous, that it might be seen afar off. For being built, not by a private person, but by the whole body of a great people, they thought they could not make it too stately and magnificent. And herein it differed so much from the altar made by Moses, that they thought, perhaps, it would administer the less occasion to their brethren to suspect it was intended for sacrifice.

Ver. 11. The children of Israel] That were in the land of Canaan. This is an instance of such a short manner of speech as I take that in the foregoing verse to be; which must be made out by some such supplement as is there mentioned. For the Reubenites, Gadites, &c. were the children of Israel, as well as those settled in the land of Canaan.

Heard say.] This is an argument the altar was not built on their side of Jordan; for then they would have seen what they were doing, and hindered the building; whereas they heard nothing of it till it was built.

Have built an altar] By a common consent. Over against the land of Canaan,—at the passage of the children of Israel. Either there where they now passed over Jordan, or where they all passed over when they encamped Canaan, or that usual place where every body was wont to pass over, that they might take the more notice of it. And here also were the gebeleaders before mentioned, like those on the other side, which seem to have been great banks cast up to keep Jordan from overflowing too far.

Ver. 12. Whole congregation] Not all the people of the land, but their elders and heads of their tribes, who in the foregoing books are often called by the name of collodaths ("all the congregation"). See Numb. xxvii. 2, xxxii. 2, and ch. xviii. of this book, ver. 1. Gathered themselves together] It seems they had been separated, being gone to settle in their several cities. To go up to war against them.] To consult about it. For they imagined them to be apostates from their religion, which, as it required them to worship the Lord alone, and no other god, so at no other place but that which he himself had chosen. Where he allowed but one altar, as there was but one God (see Deut. xii. 5, 6. 11. 13. 18. 26. 27. xiii. 12. &c.), That altar also, where he commanded sacrifices to be offered, was to be but three cubits high (Exod. xxvii. 1), so that they went not up to it by steps (Exod. xx. 26), whereas this was a high altar, like among those of the heathens, who loved to sacrifice on high places (i.e. mountains), and also upon high and lofty altars, which advanced their sacrifices nearer heaven. And this, perhaps, was one thing that incensed the congregation now assembled, and made them think their brethren were lapsing to idolatry; either intending to worship other gods, or the God of Israel in an unlawful place and manner.

Ver. 13. The children of Israel sent unto the children of Reuben, &c.] Their zeal did not so transport them, but that they prudently considered it was fit to be rightly informed of the matter of fact; and if any thing was amiss, to endeavour to set it right by counsel and argument, before they betook themselves to arms: in order to which they sent the embassy here mentioned.

Phinehas] A person of very eminent authority among them, and more likely to be received with due regard (Numb. xxxi. 8).

Ver. 14. With him ten princes, of each chief house a prince] Which were nine and a half; so that a prince was chosen out of the half tribe of Manasseh, as well as out of the other nine.

Each one was an head of the house of their fathers] That is, they were chiefarchs, as the LXX. call them, and the chief among such rulers of thousands in the several tribes (Deut. xii. 18). Ver. 15. They came unto the children of Reuben, &c.] Who, hearing of their coming, held a congregation, it is likely, of the chief persons among them, to receive their message.

Unto the land of Gilead.] So he calls here, and ver. 13, the country of the two tribes and half; by the name of an eminent part of it, which is put for the whole, as I observed upon ver. 9. They spake with them.] Made the following speech in the assembly of the two tribes and half, by the mouth of Phinehas.

Ver. 16. Thus saith the whole congregation] The representatives of the whole people of Israel, in whose name this embassy was sent.

What trespass is this that ye have committed? They were not able to express the heinousness of it.

To turn away this day.] So soon after they had seen his wonderful works, and received such a charge from Joshua as he gave them at their departure from Canaan (ver. 5). In that ye have builded you an altar.] Which they supposed was for a sacrifice. That ye might rebel this day.] Which was direct opposition to his express command, immediately after he gave them the law from Mount Sinai (Exod. xx. 24. And see the places before named upon ver. 12).

Ver. 17. Is the iniquity of Peor too little for us, 18 But that ye must turn away this day from following the Lord? and it will be, seeing ye rebel to day against the Lord, that to morrow he will be wroth with the whole congregation of Israel.

19 Notwithstanding, if the land of your possession be unclean, then pass ye over unto the land of the possession of the Lord, wherein the Lord's tabernacle dwelleth, and take possession among us: but rebel not against us, in building you an altar beside the altar of the Lord our God.

20 Did not Achan the son of Zerah commit a trespass in the accursed thing, and wrath fell on all the congregation of Israel? and that man perished not alone in his iniquity.

from which we are not cleansed] He instances in this, being himself an actor in the punishment of it, though it deserved still greater punishment. For that is the meaning of "we are not cleansed;"] have not sufficiently suffered for that sin; there being some remaining (he feared) that were infected with those idolatrous inclinations, whom God might justly cut off.

Although there was a plague] Which destroyed twenty and four thousand (see Num. xxv. 9).

Ver. 18. But that ye must turn away this day from following the Lord?] Commit more sins of that nature. For whether they intended to worship other gods, or to worship the God of Israel in a manner he did not allow, it was, in his esteem, idolatry.

It will be, seeing ye rebel to day] It must be acknowledged that they were a little too hasty in concluding their brethren to be rebels, before they had asked them for what purpose they had erected this altar, which should properly have been the first question; but their pious fear, lest God should be offended, made them immediately fall into this vehement expostulation.

That to morrow] That is, quickly, or speedily.

He will be wroth] With you for committing this sin, and with us for not punishing it.

Ver. 19. Notwithstanding,] Or rather, "and now," as the LXX. translate the Hebrew particle vare.

If the land of your possession be unclean.] They imagined the Reubenites, and Gadites, and Manasses, that land was to be holy for want of an altar, and such a token of the Divine presence as there was in the tabernacle. This appears to be the sense by what follows: which our Mr. Mede carries something further, in his observations concerning the appropriation of some place for the worship of God: which so universally prevailed from the beginning, that it was believed in those elder times, that those countries and territories within the Holy Ghost alone their Father, Son, and Holy Ghost; as the author of the old Nitzzeon (three hundred years before that of R. Lipman's) acknowledges, p. 59. Unto which he gives no answer, but only this, That these three belong to one God; which we also acknowledge.

He knoweth.] They appeal to Him who searcheth the hearts of men, and their most secret designs.

Israel he shall know.] By seeing their constancy in the religion of their ancestors.

If it be in rebellion,—(save us not this day,) They turn their speech on a sudden (as is usual in great passion) unto God himself, desiring they may not live, but be immediately destroyed by him, if they intended either to throw off his worship and service, or to worship him in any other way than according to his appointment.

Ver. 23.] That is, they desire God to punish it (for...
What have ye to do with the Lord God of Israel?

25 For the Lord hath made Jordan a border between us and you; ye children of Reuben and children of Gad; ye have no part in the Lord: so shall your children make our children cease from fearing the Lord.

26 Therefore we said, Let us now prepare to build us an altar, not for burnt offering, nor for sacrifice:

27 But that it may be a witness between us, and you, and our generations after us, that we might do the service of the Lord before him with our burnt offerings, and with our sacrifices, and with our peace offerings; that your children may not say to our children in time to come, Ye have no part in the Lord.

28 Therefore said we, that it shall be, when they should so say to us or to our generations in time to come, that we may say again, Behold the pattern of the altar of the Lord, which our fathers made, not for burnt offerings, nor for sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you.

29 God forbid that we should rebel against the Lord, and turn this day from following the Lord, to build an altar for burnt offerings, for meat offerings, or for sacrifices, beside the altar of the Lord our God that is before his tabernacle.

30 ¶ And when Phinehas the priest, and the princes of the congregation and heads of the thousands of Israel which were with him, heard the words that the children of Reuben and the children of Gad and the children of Manasseh spake, it pleased them.

31 And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest said unto the children of Reuben, and to the children of Gad, and to the children of Manasseh, This day we perceive that the Lord is among us, because ye have not committed this trespass against the Lord: now ye have delivered the children of Israel out of the hand of the Lord.

32 ¶ And Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, and the princes, returned from the children of Reuben, and—Gad, out of the land of Gilead. Under Reuben and Gad the half tribe of Manasseh is included, both here and ver. 25, 32, 33, as under the land of Gilead is included the whole sacrifices; but it is a witness between us and you.

Ver. 23. If any man should say, “I will not live according to the Lord’s will; I will eat flesh according to the Gentile way, and drink wine as the Gentiles drink;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For God will have none but Israelites to offer burnt sacrifices or peace offerings.

Ver. 24. If any man says, “Why should we not offer sacrifices to other gods also? for they also have done great things;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For the Lord has not given permission to us to offer sacrifices to other gods.

Ver. 25. In time to come thy children may say to thee, “We have made a new altar from the tabernacle and the altar of burnt offerings.”—Then thou shalt say, “I will not make the same sacrifice as the Lord has commanded me to make. For the Lord, the God of Israel, is the only God.”

Ver. 26. If any man should say, “I will not be a Israelite, for I will not be a Jew;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For the Lord has not given permission to us to be Jews.

Ver. 27. If any man should say, “I am a Jew, and I will not renounce the Law of Moses;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For the Lord has commanded us to be Jews.

Ver. 28. If any man should say, “I will not be a Israelite, for I will not be a Jew;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For the Lord has not given permission to us to be Jews.

Ver. 29. If any man should say, “I will not live according to the Lord’s will; I will eat flesh according to the Gentile way, and drink wine as the Gentiles drink;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For God will have none but Israelites to offer burnt sacrifices or peace offerings.

Ver. 30. If any man should say, “I will not live according to the Lord’s will; I will eat flesh according to the Gentile way, and drink wine as the Gentiles drink;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For God will have none but Israelites to offer burnt sacrifices or peace offerings.

Ver. 31. If any man should say, “I will not live according to the Lord’s will; I will eat flesh according to the Gentile way, and drink wine as the Gentiles drink;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For God will have none but Israelites to offer burnt sacrifices or peace offerings.

Ver. 32. If any man should say, “I will not live according to the Lord’s will; I will eat flesh according to the Gentile way, and drink wine as the Gentiles drink;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For God will have none but Israelites to offer burnt sacrifices or peace offerings.

Ver. 33. If any man should say, “I will not live according to the Lord’s will; I will eat flesh according to the Gentile way, and drink wine as the Gentiles drink;”—let him be cut off from the family of Israel. For God will have none but Israelites to offer burnt sacrifices or peace offerings.
ren of Reuben, and from the children of Gad, out of the land of Gilead, unto the land of Canaan, to the children of Israel, and brought them word again.

33 And the thing pleased the children of Israel; and the children of Israel blessed God, and the country of these tribes. The LXX. thought good to add here (and in all those verses) expressly, "and the half tribe of Manasseh;" though not in the Hebrew.

And brought them word again.] Informed them how they found things among their brethren.

Ver. 33. The thing pleased the children of Israel.] They were satisfied in the account they gave them; and approved of what their brethren had done.

Blessed God.] As Phinehas had done, that their brethren had not offended the Divine Majesty as they suspected.

Did not intend to go up against them in battle.] Laid aside that intention (which was in their mind, ver. 12), and pursued it no further.

To destroy the land.] For so they thought they were bound to do by the command, Deut. xiii. 12, &c. which extended to a whole country, as well as a city.

Ver. 34. Called the altar Ed.] That is, "a witness;" for the reason following.

It shall be a witness between us that the Lord is God.] That we own no other God but Jehovah, and him only will we worship, as he hath commanded. So the LXX. οτι Κυριος ὁ Θεος σου ειλα. ἔτος, "that the Lord is their God." In all this whole relation from ver. 10, to the end of the chapter, there being no mention of Joshua, did not intend to go up against them in battle, to destroy the land wherein the children of Reuben and Gad dwelt.

34 And the children of Reuben and the children of Gad called the altar Ed: for it shall be a witness between us that the Lord is God.

who is not once named, either as sending these ambassadors or receiving the report which they brought back, some have therefore entertained a conjecture, that Joshua was dead before this happened; and consequently, that he could not be the author of this book. But it is manifest such persons have a great desire to weaken the authority of these holy books, or else they would not draw such consequences from such frivolous observations. For it is evident that all this came to pass not long after Joshua had dismissed these tribes, with good counsel, and with his blessing; for they returning immediately after this to their own country, went no further than Jordan before they erected this altar; upon which these great persons went to expostulate with them, and heard their apology, and came back and reported it. All this is told in one continued and coherent history (as it were with one breath), without the least significance of any considerable time that passed between one part of it and the other. And the LXX. were so well satisfied of this, that they took the answer of the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites, to have been brought to Joshua; for they say he imposed the name of Ed upon the altar. So their words are in the Vatican edition, which is most common among us, και παρατηρησας ὅτι ἔτος ποῑσα, &c.

CHAPTER XXIII.

1 Joshua's exhortation before his death, 3 by former benefits, 5 by promises, 11 and by threatenings.

1 And it came to pass a long time after that the Lord had given rest unto Israel from all their enemies round about, that Joshua waxed old and stricken in age.

2 And Joshua called for all Israel, and for their elders, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers, and said unto them, I am old and stricken in age.

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. A long time after.] Some take it to have been fourteen years after their conquest of the country (xii. 23), and seven years after the division of it (see xiv. 10).

Joshua waxed old] This was said of him before the land was divided (xiii. 1), and a portion thereof given unto him: where he built a city; which took up so much time, that probably he was now in the last year of his life.

Ver. 2. Called for all Israel.] Sent out a summons to them to come to him at Timnath-serah, where he lived, as the Jews will have it; but rather to Shiloh, where they might appear before God, as well as before him, and have the greater regard to his words.

For their elders.] The word and is not in the Hebrew text: and therefore these words are an explanation of what he means by all Israel: not all the people (who could not, without great inconvenience, come thither, and could not all hear him if they did), but their elders; that is, the great Sanhedrin, as they were called in future times; and for their heads, that is of their tribes and families; and for their judges, who were settled in all the lesser cities; and for their officers, who attended upon the judges to execute their sentence.

I am old.] He would make them sensible that this might be the last time he should be able to speak to them, which might move them to give greater attention unto what he said.

Ver. 2. Ye have seen.] Or rather, "behold, ye have seen;" for so the particle ve (which we translate and) sometimes signifies: Gen. xxiv. 31. "Behold, I have prepared the house," &c.

Because of you.] For your sake; that he might make room for you in their country, by expelling them out of it.

The Lord your God is he that hath fought for you.] See ch. i. 9. xi. 8. 10. 42. xi. 6. The Targum here saith, (as in x. 42), "The Lord your God, his Word fought for you" (see xiv. 12).
5 And the Lord your God, he shall expel them from before you, and drive them from out of your sight; and ye shall possess their land, as the Lord your God hath promised unto you.

6 Be ye therefore very courageous to keep and to do all that is written in the book of the law of Moses, that ye turn not aside thereto from to the right hand or to the left;

7 That ye come not among these nations, these that remain among you; neither make mention of the name of their gods, nor cause to swear by them, neither serve them, nor bow yourselves unto them:

8 But cleave unto the Lord your God, as ye have done unto this day.

9 For the Lord hath driven out from before you great nations and strong: but as for you, no man hath been able to stand before you unto this day.

Ver. 4.] The meaning is, he had divided among them the whole land of Canaan, from Jordan in the east to the Mediterranean in the west; as well that part of the land which remained still unconquered, as that out of which they had expelled the ancient inhabitants.

Ver. 5.] This relates unto those who remained unsubdued (mentioned in the beginning of the foregoing verse), whom they should undoubtedly conquer and possess their country, if they adhered to God in faithful obedience, as he exhorts them in the following part of this chapter.

Ver. 6. To keep and to do] Or (as it may be translated), "by observing and doing," All that is written in the book of the law of Moses, which was the condition upon which God promised to continue them in the possession of this land. By this it is evident, that the book of the law of Moses was extant in those days, and that the people read it. That ye turn not aside See upon Deut. v. 22.

Ver 7. That ye come not among these nations,] Have no familiarity with them, especially by marriage.

Neither make mention of the name of their gods, With any sort of respect to them (see Exod. xxiii. 13. and Deut. xii. 3).

Nor cause to swear by them, Not make a gentle swear by the name of his god, which was utterly unlawful, as Selden observes out of Maimonides in aed. Zara (see lib. ii. De Jure Nat. et Gent. cap. 13.) For this was to suppose they had knowledge of men's thoughts, and power to punish those that forsook themselves. And the forbidding this was also to secure them from making league and covenants with the gentiles which they would not look upon without an oath.

Neither serve them, By offering sacrifices, or praying, or making vows to them, though never so secretly.

Nor bow yourselves unto them, As all inward reverence, so all outward respect likewise was forbidden to be paid to them, especially open and public seats of worship. Interpreters here observe a gradation, from familiarity with them to the most gross idolatry, in which their friendship with these people concluded.

Ver. 8.] A remarkable instance of which they had all lately given, when the nine tribes and a half were so unanimously resolved to punish idolatry, with the expirition of those that were guilty of it (xxii. 33),

10 One man of you shall chase a thousand: for the Lord your God, he it is that fighteth for you, as he hath promised you.

11 Take good heed therefore unto yourselves, that ye love the Lord your God.

12 Else if ye do in any wise go back, and cleave unto the remnant of these nations, even these that remain among you, and shall make marriages with them, and go in unto them, and they to you:

13 Know for a certainty that the Lord your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides, and thorns in your eyes, until ye perish from off this good land which the Lord your God hath given you.

14 And, behold, this day I am going the way of all the earth: and ye know in all your hearts and in all your souls, that not one thing hath failed of all the good things which the Lord your God spake concerning you; all are come to pass unto you, and not one thing hath failed thereof.

15 Therefore it shall come to pass, that as all good things are come upon you, which the Lord your God promised you; so shall the Lord bring upon you all evil things, until he have destroyed you from off this good land which the Lord your God hath given you.

16 When ye have transgressed the covenant of the Lord your God, which he commanded you, and have gone and served other gods, and bowed yourselves to them; then shall the anger of the Lord be kindled against you, and ye shall perish quickly from off the good land which he hath given unto you.

Until ye perish from off this good land] For, with the love and favour of God, they forfeited also their inheritance which he had bestowed on them.

Ver. 14. I am going the way of all the earth.] Shall die shortly, as all men must one time or other; therefore hearken to the words of a dying man.

Ye know in all your hearts.] Are all fully convinced.

Not one thing hath failed, &c.] See upon xxii. 45. And God was as good as his word ever after, as Solomon acknowledges, 1 Kings viii. 56.

Ver. 15. So shall the Lord] When he ceased to be their God.

Bring upon you all evil things,] According to what Moses had predicted at large, Lev. xxvi. and Deut. xxviii.

In my annotations upon which last chapter, I have demonstrated, that not one thing hath failed of all the threatenings there mentioned, but all literally fulfilled to a title: for God's faithfulness is no less visible in fulfilling his threatenings than his promises.

Ver. 16. And have gone and served other gods,] This was the principal thing in the covenant, that they should have no other gods but him alone; as I have observed from a great number of places in the book of Deuteronomy.

Ye shall perish quickly] See Deut. xxviii. 20.

CHAPTER XXIV.

1 Joshua assembleth the tribes at Shechem. 2 A brief history of God's benefits from Terah. 14 He reneweth the covenant between them and God. 26 A stone the witness of the covenant. 29 Joshua's age, death, and burial. 32 Joseph's bones are buried. 33 Eleazar died.

1 And Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel to Shechem, and called for the elders of Israel, and for their heads, and for their judges, and for their officers; and they presented themselves before God.

And Joshua said unto all the people, Thus and where the Israelites, at their first entrance into Canaan, renewed their covenant with God (Josh. viii. 30, &c.). For Ebal and Gerizim were hard by Shechem.

Called for the elders, &c.] The same persons mentioned xxiii. 2. Which places give us a distinct account of the persons concerned in the government of the Israelites; as Const. L'Empeur observes, in his annotations upon Bertram De Repub. Judicis, p. 392, 395, 396.

They presented themselves before God.] At his tabernacle; which was, as I said, for the present brought hither. For it is plain, as Cornel. Bertram observes (I. De Repub. Judicis, cap. 15, p. 249), the kings or chief rulers of Israel had a power to carry the ark from the place of its constant residence when there was a great occasion for it (1 Sam. iv. 3, 4. 2 Sam. xv. 21). And now, at this great assembly of the whole nation by their representatives, there was a just reason for its being brought hither (seeing Joshua could not conveniently, by reason of his great old age, go to Shiloh), that it might be a more solemn meeting, being held in the presence of God. Mr. Mede hath another notion of this matter; for he thinks that there was a process, or praying-place, erected by the Israelites (at least by the Ephraimites, in whose lot Shechem was) after they had subdued the country, that they might resort hither to call upon God, when they were not likely to go as far as the tabernacle. Many such places he makes account there were; of which see more on ver. 26.

Ver. 2. Joshua said unto all the people,] That were there present, viz. the elders, heads, judges, and officers, mentioned in the foregoing verse; who were to report his words to all the people.

Thus saith the Lord God] This is an argument that Joshua spake all that follows by a Divine impulse; for he begins his speech in the solemn form used by the prophets (thus saith the Lord) and introduces God himself speaking in his own person. From whence it may be inferred he was a prophet, as well as the ruler of God's people.

Your fathers dwelt on the other side of the flood. That is, of the river Euphrates.

In old times.] A long time before they came from Ur of the Chaldees into Haran (Gen. xi. 28, 31).

Terah, the father of Abraham, and—Nachor—These were Terah's two eldest sons (Gen. xi. 26). They sowed other gods. All agree that Terah was an idolater living in that country, from whence, as many think, idolatry first came (Gen. xxxi. 19). The Jews, in Schalsch, Hakkabala, say he was a priest; see Hottinger in his Smeqna Orientalce, cap. 8. p. 290. Others of them say, he was a sinner, who made images of several materials, αγάμος τοικίας ἐκ σαπίου, saying, These were gods;" as Siddas speaks, who, together with Epiphanius, is of the opinion (see Bocharius, in his Philag. lib. ii. cap. 5). Abraham himself also, most agree, was bred up in the same idolatry; though some few deny it; as Hottinger observes in the same place; where he alleges the words of Maimonides, who saith, He was converted to the worship of the Creator of all, in the forty-eighth year of his age; and that his father Terah also repented, and worshipped the true and only God (see upon Gen. xi. 31).

Ver. 3. Took your father Abraham from the other side of the flood.] From that idolatrous country where he was born and educated. Which is mentioned as a singular obligation upon the Israelites to adhere unto God, who singled out the father of their families, so many ages ago, to be his worshippers. This Maimonides, having occasion to mention these words of Joshua, represents in very pathetic expressions: "How great is the benefit (saith he) that we receive by these precepts, which have freed us from such a grand error in which our father was educated, and converted us to the true belief of God! by teaching us that he created all things, and that he is to be worshipped, and loved, and feared, and he only; and that there is no great labour required to do his will, but only the love and fear of him, in which two all his worship is perfected," &c. (More Nevehcham, par. iii. cap. 20).

Led him.] From Charran, after his father's death. Throughout all the land of Canaan. Till he came to Shechem (where the Israelites now were assembled), and so to Beth-el; and so on still towards the south of the land of Canaan (Gen. xii. 8, 9).

Gave him Isaac.] In order to the fulfilling of his promise (Gen. xv. 5), he bestowed a son upon him, when he was a hundred years old (Gen. xxii. 1, 2; &c.).

and ye came unto the sea; and the Egyptians pursued after your fathers with chariots and horsemen unto the Red sea.

7 And when they cried unto the Lord, he put darkness between you and the Egyptians, and brought the sea upon them, and covered them; and your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt: and ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season.

8 And I brought you into the land of the Amorites, which dwelt on the other side Jordan; and they fought with you: and I gave them into your hand, that ye might possess their land; and I destroyed them from before you.

9 Then Balak the son of Zippor, king of Ver. 4. I gave unto Isaac Jacob and Esau.] Who had a very numerous issue (Gen. xxvi. 24, &c.).

I gave unto Esau mount Seir.] He and his brother being grown so rich, and their cattle so increased, that there was not room for them both in the land of Canaan, so they simejourned (Gen. xxxvi. 5—8).

Jacob and his children went down into Egypt.] Though Esau left the land of Canaan entirely to him, yet the time was not come when God intended to plant his posterity in it; but they were forced to go down into Egypt, where they suffered a cruel bondage (Gen. xli. 6, Exod. i. 11, &c.). So the LXX. explain it.

Ver. 5. I sent Moses also and Aaron.] And when they were multiplied exceedingly (Exod. i. 14, 20), these two great persons were sent to deliver them from that bondage (Exod. iii. 10, iv. 14).

I plagued Egypt.] Smote it with these signs (as the LXX. explain it) which are related in that book of Exodus.

Afterward I brought you out.] By those wonderful plagues they were, at last, constrained to let the Israelites depart, as they desired (Exod. xii. 31, &c.).

Ver. 6. I brought your fathers out of Egypt: and you came unto the sea.] When he had brought them out (as is related, Exod. xii. 40) they were led by God through the way of wilderness of the Red Sea (Exod. xiii. 18), by which they encamped, and were in very great straits (xiv. 9).

The Egyptians pursued after your fathers.] Imagining them to be run over by the difficulty, that they could not escape out of their hand (Exod. xiv. 3).

Ver. 7. He put darkness between you and the Egyptians.] So that when they had overtaken them, they could not see where they were (Exod. xiv. 19, 20).

Brought the sea upon them.] Insomuch that they marched after them into the sea, where they were overwhelmed (Exod. xiv. 24, 28).

Your eyes have seen what I have done in Egypt.] Or, upon the Egyptians. He appeals to them for the truth of this, who had seen them lie dead upon the sea-shore (Exod. xiv. 30, 31). For their elders, to whom he now speaks (ver. 1), were all then there: and now not only men of great dignity, but (many of them at least) in great age. Ye dwelt in the wilderness a long season. Forty years, Numb. xiv. 33. where he gave them a law, and fed them miraculously, &c.

Ver. 8. I brought you into the land of the Amorites.] Towards the latter end of that time (Numb. xxxi. 20, 21).

They fought with you, &c.] See there, ver. 23, 24, 33, &c.

Ver. 9. Then Balak—arose and warred against JOSHUA.

Moab, arose and warred against Israel, and sent and called Baalath the son of Beor to curse you: but I would not hearken unto Baalath; therefore he blessed you still: so I delivered you out of his hand.

11 And ye went over Jordan, and came unto Jericho: and the men of Jericho fought against you, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Girgashites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites; and I delivered them into your hand.

12 And I sent the hornet before you, which drove them out from before you, even the two kings of the Amorites; but not with thy sword nor with thy bow.

13 And I have given you a land for which ye did not labour, and cities which ye built not, and ye dwell in them; of the vineyards and oliveyards which ye planted not do ye eat.

14 ¶ Now therefore fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and in truth; and put away the gods which your fathers served on the other side of the flood, and in Egypt; and serve ye the Lord.

15 And if it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve; as infested them, that many of them were forced to leave their country, and flee into other places; or, that when they came to give them battle, these hornets made such assaults upon them, as facilitated the victory. This God promised in Exod. xxiii. 27, 28. Deut. vii. 20, and here Joshua remem- brances how true he was to his word. The Book of Wisdom calls them ἐνοπλοιοί, the forerunners of God’s host; and Kimchi saith, they flew in the eyes of the Canaanites, and made them so blind, that they could not see to fight.

Even the two kings of the Amorites | Sihon and Og, whose country was first infested with them; and after the kings of Canaan, and their people, felt their fury, for this is a short expression, like that which I observed xxii. 10.

But not with thy sword, nor with thy bow. These swarms of hornets, it seems, did greater execution than the armies of the Israelites. We do not read of their assaulting the Canaanites in any of the battles that Joshua fought with them; for he did not think fit to mention it particularly in the foregoing account of his victory, but now in general, when he was to sum up all the mercies of God to them.

Ver. 15. I have given you a land for which ye did not labour | As Joshua had observed before (xi. 13). Of the vineyards—which ye planted not do ye eat? According to his promise, Deut. vi. 10, 11.

Ver. 14. Fear the Lord. | The fear of God commonly signifies his worship and service, unto which he exhorteth them in the following words: which seem to relate to all outward acts of worship; as this to the inward reverence they owed to him in their minds as the only God.

Serve him in sincerity and in truth. | Worship no other God together with him, nor mix any idolatrous rites with those prescribed by him; but serve him constantly and purely according to his law which is the truth (Ps. cxix. 142).

Put away the gods which your fathers served | See ver. 2. This intimates, that there were now some idolaters among them, though secretly in private, and not openly; for they had lately expressed so unanimously such a zeal against any appearance of idolatry, that one cannot think there was any known worshipper of other gods now in the nation.

In Egypt | Where they began to be corrupted in their religion, as is often suggested by the prophet Ezekiel, xx. 18. xxiii. 3. 8. 10. 21. 27.

Serve ye the Lord. | He repeats it again, as a thing of the greatest moment, that they should worship the Lord alone.

Ver. 15. If it seem evil unto you to serve the Lord, choose you this day whom ye will serve. | He could not think they would turn atheists, and have no God at all; and he was unwilling to suppose that they would prefer any other god to him, who had obliged them by such benefits as are before mentioned: which whether the gods which your fathers served that were on the other side of the flood, or the gods of the Amorites, in whose land ye dwell: but as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord.

16 And the people answered and said, God forbid that we should forsake the Lord, to serve other gods;

17 For the Lord our God, he is it that brought us up and our fathers out of the land of Egypt, from the house of bondage, and which did those great signs in our sight, and preserved us in all the way wherein we went, and among all the people through whom we passed;

18 And the Lord drove out from before us all the people, even the Amorites which dwelt in the land: therefore will we also serve the Lord; for he is our God.

19 And Joshua said unto the people, Ye cannot serve the Lord: for he is an Holy God; he is a jealous God; he will not forgive your transgressions nor your sins.

20 If ye forsake the Lord, and serve strange gods, then he will turn and do you hurt, and consume you, after that he hath done you good.

21 And the people said unto Joshua, Nay; but we will serve the Lord.

22 And Joshua said unto the people, Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the Lord, to serve him. And they said, We are witnesses.

23 Now therefore put away, said he, the he expresses in his rhetorical form of speech; which is as much as if he had said, If you like not the Lord's service, tell me whom ye will serve! Where do you hope to find a God comparable to him?

Whether the gods which your fathers served? That had some colour for it, because of its antiquity; but was condemned by Abraham their father, who forsook that religion, and was blessed for it by God, with the inheritance he had now given them in the land of Canaan.

Or the gods of the Amorites? That was so absurd, as to need no comutation; for those gods could not defend their servants that worshipped them.

But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord. He declares his firm resolution (let them take what course they pleased), together with his whole family (as far as he could oblige them), to worship the Lord alone.

Ver. 16. The people answered. All the elders and others there present, and all those to whom they reported what Joshua had said, made this answer.

God forbid! that we should forsake the Lord. The Hebrew word chaiah (which we translate God forbid!) imports a great abhorrence and abomination of that which is mentioned with it.

To serve other gods. Which they now looked upon as the greatest madness.

Ver. 17. They gave such powerful reasons why they should serve none but the Lord alone; that if they pretended to serve them in their hearts as they were now, they could never have gone after other gods.

Ver. 18. All the people. That is, of Canaan.

Even the Amorites. In the Hebrew, "and the Amorites;" that is, together with the two kings of the Amorites, whom they had driven before out of the land; on the other side of Jordan.

There were not served the Lord. Follow the example of Joshua, their leader (ver. 15).

For he is our God. As they were convinced by their wonderful deliverance out of Egypt; all the great signs he wrought there, and after they came from thence; and the care he took of them in the wilderness, and all other places; and now by their late visitations over most potent enemies, whom he had driven out of their country, and put the Israelites in possession of it.

Ver. 19. Ye cannot serve the Lord. This is far from signifying an utter impossibility of it (for that would have contradicted his exhortation, ver. 14), but that they were so very prone to idolatry, that they would not be able to persevere steadfast in their resolution, unless they took care constantly to reflect upon, and lay to heart, what they had now acknowledged (ver. 17, 18), which he was afraid they would not do.

For he is an holy God; he is a jealous God. Who, having no equal (that is meant by holy), will endure no rival; and therefore they who communicated the worship proper to him, unto any other besides him, or with him, were deemed to deny his incomparable sanctity, and said in Scripture to pronounce his holy name, as Mr. Mede observes (see book 1. disc. 2). It is a just remark which Mr. Allen here makes, in his excellent book of the Judgment of the Jewish Church against the Unitarians, ch. ix. that here is a plain idea of a plurality of persons in the Godhead, the words in the Hebrew being, he is the holy Gods;" like that of Eccles. vii. 1. Remember thy Creator. And, indeed, this is a place anciently noted by the Christian doctors (whom the Jews call heretics), who asked R. Samuel, as the Jews themselves tell us, what he had to answer unto these words. Ye cannot serve the Lord, Ki Elohim kedoshim Hu, "because he is the holy Gods!" Who had nothing to reply, but that Joshua doth not say, "They are the holy Gods" but "He is the holy Gods." Which is the very same that we affirm, that he is Three in One. This is in Beroschith Rabbi, mentioned by Raymond in his Pugio Fidei, and by J. Wagenseil, in his confession of Lipman's Carmen Memoriale, p. 129.

He will not forgive your transgressions. But make those who assume any other deity into fellowship with him in his service, to show he represents such dishonour done to his Divine Majesty.

Ver. 20. If ye serve strange gods. Either the gods of the Amorites, before mentioned, or those that their fathers anciently served.

Then he will turn and do you hurt. Alter the course of his providence towards you, and send as many curses upon you, as he hath done blessings; according to the proportion of your crimes; and with it.

Ver. 21. They desire him to entertain a better opinion of them; for they persist in their well-grounded resolution (ver. 16-18).

Ver. 22. Ye are witnesses against yourselves that ye have chosen you the Lord, to serve him. This solemn profession, which they had thus deliberately and publicly made, he tells them, would testify against them, and condemn them, if they proved false to God.

We are witnesses. Here they renew that choice of God for their king, which their forefathers made when they came out of Egypt (in the nineteenth and twenty-fourth chapters of Exodus), and acknowledged they should be self-condemned if they did not make it good.

Ver. 23. Put away—"the strange gods that are among you." See ver. 14. This is an argument that he strange gods which are among you, and incline your heart unto the Lord God of Israel.

24 And the people said unto Joshua, The Lord our God will we serve, and his voice will we obey.

25 So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, and set them a statute and an ordinance in Shechem.

26 ¶ And Joshua wrote these words in the book of the law of God, and took a great stone, and set it up there under an oak, that was by the sanctuary of the Lord.

27 And Joshua said unto all the people, Behold, this stone shall be a witness unto us; for it hath heard all the words of the Lord which he spake unto us: it shall be therefore a witness unto you, lest ye deny your God.

was a prophet, as I said upon ver. 29, that he saw their inward disposition, and the secret affection they had to idols. For though there was no public idol worshipped, yet he knew, by the spirit of prophecy, that they had their prelutes (as the Romans called them), "household gods;" or, rather, gods which they worshipped secretly in their closets, as our Dr. Spencer observes, lib. iii. dissert. 1. cap. 3. These being the very same words which Jacob used to his household when he suspected them of the same crime, though there was no open idolatry practised among them (Gen. xxxv. 2).

Incline your heart unto the Lord] Settle your affection upon the Lord alone, who you profess is your sovereign, to whom the whole nation hath infinite obligations (ver. 16—18.)

Ver. 21.] They repeat their professed resolution a third time, which made it more binding; and a stronger witness against them, if they forsook the Lord.

Ver. 25.] So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day, Engaged them to make good this solemn profession, by renewing the covenant they had formerly entered into, both in the time of Moses, and in his time: wherein they promised to worship him alone, and be obedient to him; and he promised to do for them as he had formerly done; that is, be their constant protector and benefactor. There are those who think this covenant was now established by sacrifice, as it was when they came out of Egypt (Exod. xxiv. 4, 5), and when they came into Canaan (Josh. viii. 31.). But, as there is no mention of an altar, or any offering, so it is not likely that Joshua would offer any sacrifice but in the place which God had chosen, which was Shiloh: for though we suppose the sanctuary to have been brought hither for a little time, yet it was not the settled place of the Divine residence.

Set the word in your heart and an ordinance] It is commonly understood, that he propounded to them in brief the precepts of the law; which are the conditions of the covenant: but it may be expounded, that he enacted this covenant to have the force of a statute and ordinance, or judgment, as it is in the Hebrew.

In Shechem.] So that it was called hereafter the covenant or statute in Shechem, where they all made repeated professions of love to God.

Ver. Joshua wrote these words] From whence, as I observed in the preface, the Talmudists gather Joshua to have been the author of this book. As if these words signified, that he, after the example of Moses, committed to writing all that we read in this book, and added it at the end of the five books written by Moses, as it is now annexed to them. But it must be confessed, that one cannot certainly infer more from these words than that he wrote the words of the foregoing covenant; and this he did, as it here follows, in the very book of the law of God, that it might be preserved in everlasting remembrance.

In the book of the law of God,] Which was laid up by Moses' order, in the side of the ark (Deut. xxxi. 24—26). From whence he took it, and wrote in it all that had passed between him and the people, that they might look upon this as a sacred transaction, as indeed it was, and most carefully observe it: and perhaps he wrote it also in that copy of the law of God, which the princes had for the use of every tribe (see upon Deut. xxxi. 9).

Took a great stone, and set it up there: As a monument of the covenant now made. Which was an ancient way of preserving the memory of things past, as appears by what Jacob did, Gen. xxviii. 18, and they themselves had lately done, iv. 20, 21, &c.

Upon this stone, it is probable, there was an inscription, signifying what it meant.

Under an oak, that was by the sanctuary of the Lord.] This is one argument Mr. Mede uses (in the place I mentioned upon ver. 1), to prove that the sanctuary was properly so called, because it be here meant, because it was unlawful to plant any trees near it (Deut. vi. 21, 22), and therefore he understands hereby a prosacula, or praying-place, which, in memory of Jacob, was here at Shechem. And he doth plainly show, there were both such places, and also synagogues, in several parts of the country; the former being in the fields, open on all sides, the latter in cities, covered up in our houses are. And I may add, that we do read of sanctuaries, in the plural number, that were among them in aftertimes (Amos vii. 9). Yet it must be acknowledged, that the argument he uses from the place I mentioned in Deuteronomy is not cogent: for though they be prohibited here to plant a grove of any trees near God's altar, after the manner of the gentiles, this did not make it unlawful to set up the sanctuary under a tree that had been planted before; especially when it was done only for a short time, and not to make it the settled place for its constant abode.

But there are those who avoid this seeming difficulty, by referring these words, "in the sanctuary of the Lord" (as they may be translated), not to the oak, but to the ancient grove before mentioned, "the plain of Jordan," which was in the sanctuary. And thus, it is certain, words are sometimes to be connected, not with those immediately preceding, but with those which are more remote. A notable instance of which we have in Gen. xiii. 10, where those words in the end of the verse, "As thou comest unto Zear," cannot be joined to "the land of Egypt," just before mentioned, but must be joined to "the plain of Jordan," in the very beginning of the verse.

Ver. 27. This stone shall be a witness unto us:] As Laban said concerning the heap of stones which he and Jacob raised (Gen. xxxi. 48, 51, 52).

For it hath heard all the words of the Lord which he spake unto us:] All those speeches which had been delivered by Joshua in the name of God (ver. 2, 3, &c.), and so also that the Israelites had answered to him: that is, the covenant between God and them; which being renewed before this stone, it is said, by an elegant figure, to have heard what was spoken; because it would remain to testify and declare to all posterity the engagements that lay upon them. Thus the prophet calls to all creatures, "Hear, O heaven," &c.

It shall be therefore a witness unto you:] To accuse them; as much as if it had heard what they said, and could speak against them.
28 So Joshua let the people depart, every man unto his inheritance.

29 ¶ And it came to pass after these things, that Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of the Lord, died, being an hundred and ten years old.

30 And they buried him in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in mount Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of Gaash.

31 And Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua, and all the days of the elders that overlived Joshua, and which had known all the works of the Lord, that he had done for Israel.

32 ¶ And the bones of Joseph, which the children of Israel brought up out of Egypt, buried they in Shechem, in a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem for an hundred pieces of silver; any it became the inheritance of the children of Joseph.

Ver. 28. And the sanctuary of the Lord returned to its settled place, which was Shiloh.

Ver. 29. After these things. Not long after, in all probability.

Joshua—the servant of the Lord, died. Leaving this honourable character behind him, which Moses also had, that he had served the Lord faithfully.

Being an hundred and ten years old. Of the same age with Joseph. How many of these years he spent in Canaan, as the chief ruler of God's people, men's opinions are very widely different: for some say he lived twenty and eight years after they came over Jordan (which is the opinion of the Jews in Seder Olam); though others will not allow so much as the odd eight years, but say it was only seven. There is a middle opinion maintained by others, that he was their governor seventeen years (see Bonfrius).

Ver. 30. Timnath-serah. Called in Judg. ii. 9. Timnath-heres: because of the image of the sun engraven on his sepulchre, in memory of that famous day, when the sun stood still till he had completed his victory. So several of the Jewish authors say, particularly he who wrote the book put out by Hottinger, under the title of Cippi Hebraici, p. 33, where he saith, his father Nun was buried here and Caleb the son of Jephunneh (see also his Smegna Orientale, cap. 8. p. 523). And thus Tully saith, a sphere and a cylinder were put upon the tomb of Archimedes.

On the north side of the hill of Gaash. So called, as the Jews fable, because it trembled and quaked, at the burial of Joshua, whose death the people did not enough bewail. Which fancy, it is likely, came into their head, because there is not mention here of any days of mourning for him, as there were for Aaron and Moses. In which St. Jerome and other of the fathers think a kind of a mystery; viz. that under the law, when the kingdom of heaven was not yet opened, they had reason to mourn and weep for the death of their friends; but under the gospel, wherein is revealed by the Lord Jesus (of whom Joshua was a figure) the wonderful love of God to men, &c. there is no reason for mourning and lamentation, but rather for rejoicing.

Of this hill, see Const. L'Empereur upon Benjamin's Itinerarium, who calls Montpelier by this name of Har-Gaash, the trembling hill, p. 142, 143.

Ver. 31. Israel served the Lord all the days of Joshua. No idolatry appeared among them publicly while he lived (whatsoever private superstition might be practised, ver. 14, 23), for all that wicked generation which came out of Egypt (except the younger sons) were consumed in the wilderness, before Joshua took the conduct of them. And God kept them there so many years, as wasted them also, for this reason among others, that they might forget the idolatrous custom of Egypt, unto which it early appeared by their making the golden calf, they were strongly inclined. Thus St. Chrysostom adNot. (lib. i. adv. Vizza Monast., viuper.) God, saith he, that the children of Israel might unlearn the evil customs of Egypt, brought them καταμαχον ἐκ τοῦ ἐν αὐτοῖς, "to lead a solitary life in the wilderness," forming their minds, as in a monastery, far from those who had corrupted them. And he destroyed there all the elder sort, that none might enter into Palestine, but they who had not seen the superstitious impieties of the Egyptians, καὶ μνήμη διδόκειον ἐκείνῳ τοῦ τοιαύτης πονηρίας, "and that they might have no master left among them to teach them such kind of wickedness.

All the days of the elders that overlived Joshua. These elders had been chosen by Moses, who knew them to be men of great piety; that had not only a long age, but observed and kept in mind all God's wonderful works; and would put others in mind of them and teach them to serve and obey the Lord.

From this place the Jews labour to establish all their oral traditions; which Moses, say they, delivered to Joshua, and he to these elders, and they to the prophets, and they to others (see Maimonides in Sedr Zeram, set forth by our most learned Dr. Pococke p. 24), for which there is no foundation.

Ver. 32. The bones of Joseph. It is a needless pains which the Jews bestow in reconciling this place with Exodus xiii. 19, where it is said, "Moses took the bones of Joseph with him." For there is no contradiction between these two places, the children of Israel doing what Moses required them to do; who could not carry them away himself, but saw them brought out of Egypt. Yet thus they gravely discourse about this matter, in the Talmud (tit. Sota. cap. 1. sect. 47): "when any one begins a thing but doth not bring it to perfection, and another comes and finishes it, the Scripture speaks of him who completes it, as if he alone had done it." Buried they in Shechem. Which was one reason, perhaps, for gathering the great assembly above mentioned, that they might the more solemnly deposit the bones of this great man, in that portion of land which his father Jacob had given him; see Gen. xviii. 23, where it seems they thought it most agreeable to lay him, rather than in the cave of Machpelah. It may be reasonably thought also, that the bodies of the rest of the sons of Jacob, from whom the twelve tribes descended, were brought into Canaan, to be there interred, as Josephus relates from ancient tradition, lib. ii. Antiq. cap. 4. And St. Stephen confirms it, Acts vii. 16. For though Joseph excelled them all in dignity, and gave this special charge about his body, yet, no doubt, every tribe had as great a reason to the head of it, and would be inclined to do the same for their fathers that Joseph desired for himself. But whether they buried them in the sepulchre at Machpelah, or in some eminent place in their own tribe, as Joseph was, there is none that gives us any account.

In a parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Heman. See Gen. xxiii. 18, 19. This shows they did bury him in the city of Shechem, but in a field near it, which was his own ground; for so the ancient manner was, not to bury in cities and towns, but in the adjacent fields or gardens.
33 And Eleazar the son of Aaron died; and they buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son, which was given him in mount Ephraim.

It became the inheritance of the children of Joseph.] Of the Ephraimites, who gave Shechem to the Levites for a city of refuge (xxi. 20, 21).

Ver. 33. Eleazar died.] Who imitated Joshua (if we may believe the Samaritan Chronicle), in calling all the elders and princes of the tribes to him before he died, charging them strictly to obey all the commands of God. After which he put off his sacred garments, and clothed his son Phinehas with them. This is so far from being improbable, that it is likely all the elders did the same, as far as their authority could reach; being very desirous their posterity might continue firm and steadfast in the worship of God alone.

They buried him in a hill that pertained to Phinehas his son.] In the Hebrew the words are, “in the hill of Phinehas; that is, a hill called by his name. It being the manner, as I have noted elsewhere, to call places by the name of their eldest son.

Which was given him in mount Ephraim.] It is a question to whom this hill was given: most probable to Eleazar, who, being the high-priest at the time of the division of the land, they thought fit to give him a peculiar portion, distinct from all the cities of the priests; none of which were in the tribe of Ephraim, but all in the tribes of Judah, Benjamin, and Simeon, as we read xxii. 9. 17. 19. And they gave it Eleazar in this country, that he might be near to the tabernacle (which was in Shiloh), and near to Joshua, to be ready on all occasions to advise him, and consult the oracle for him. But against this there lies a great objection, that no Levite or priest was to have any portion in the division of the land; and therefore it is the most received opinion among the Jews, that either Eleazar or Phinehas had this inheritance in the right of his wife. So the Gemara Babylonica on Bava Buthra, and a great many others, mentioned by Mr. Selden, in his book De Successionibus ad Leges Hebr. cap. 18, where he observes another example of this mortal succession, as he calls it; that is, the husband succeeding his wife in her estate after her death, in 1 Chron. ii. 21, where the twenty-three cities which Jair possessed, Kimchi saith he had by his wife.

These last five verses, it is evident, were not written by Joshua: but this is no argument he did not write this book; no more than that Moses did not write the Pentateuch, because there is the like account given of his death and burial in the conclusion of it, by some other author (see Deut. xxxiv. 1). The Talmudists, I observed, say in Bava Buthra, that Joshua wrote his own book, and the last eight verses of the Pentateuch. And they say in the same place (cap. 1), as to what is written here, ver. 29, it was done by Eleazar; and what is said, ver. 33, it was written by Phinehas; or rather, these five verses, from 29 to the end, were written by Samuel: who, being a prophet, was moved and directed by God to continue the history of this people from the death of Joshua to his own time.

The Student and Lover of Literature at Home, who has hitherto been compelled to wade through volumes of Reviews for a single article, may now become possessed of every article worth reading, for little more than the cost of the annual subscriptions.

The following is extracted from a very able article on Mr. Macaulay, from 'The New Annual Register.'

"It is impossible to cast even a careless glance over the literature of the last thirty years, without perceiving the peculiar position this period occupied by critics, essayists, and essayists. Criticism in the old days of Monthly Reviews and Gentleman's Magazines, was quite as free from the prejudices of party and sect, and the "barren rascals" of letters, who scribbled, sinned and starved in attics and cells; but it has since become interwoven into a creative art, and numbers among its profusors some of the most accomplished writers of the age. Denis, Brougham, Winstanley, Thos. Cibber, Griffiths, and other "eminent hands," as well as the nameless contributors to periodicals and deceased pamphlets, have departed, body and soul, and left not a wreck behind; and their places have been supplied by such men as Coleridge, Carlyle, Macaulay, Lamb, Hazlett, Jeffrey, Wilson, Gifford, Mackintosh, Sydney Smith, Hallam, Campbell, Talfourd and Brougham. Indeed every celebrated writer of the present century, without being a hero of literature, a military exception, has added or excelled in criticism. It has been the road to fame and profit, and has commanded both spouters and grumblers, when the fortunate or unfortunate critic has been blessed with neither. Many of the strongest minds of the age will leave no other record behind them than critical essays and popular speculations. To those who have made criticism a business, it has led to success in other professions.

The Edinburgh Review, which took the lead in the establishment of the new order of things, was projected in a lofty idea by two briefs barristers, and a tiresome publican, the former are now lords, and the latter a squab prebendary, rejoicing in the reputation of being the finest wit and smartest divine of the age. That celebrated journal made reviewing more respectable than authorship. It was started at a time when the genius of literature demanded a radical reform, and a sharp vein of criticism. Its contributors were men who possessed talents and common sense, and they had the advantage over most of those they reviewed, who did not happen to possess either. Grub Street quarterly quaked to its foundations, as the northern comet shot its portentous shite into the dark valleys, where authors and purility buzzed and lived. The citizens of London, on the night previous to Waterloo, were hardly more tremor-struck than the vast array of fated authors who, every three months, waited the appearance of the halitcal book, standing at every sound which betokened its arrival.

"Whispered with white lips, the foe! it comes! it comes!"

"In the early and palmy days of the Review, when reviewers were wise and writers were bards, the shore of the great ocean of books was 'heaped with the damned like fishes.' Like an 'eagle in a dovecote,' it fluttered the leaves of the Minerva press, and stilled the weak notes of imbecile eloquence, and the dull croak of inspired vulgarity, cured ignorance, and pomm agosto and the descent of Attila on the Roman Empire was not too awful a visitation to the Italians, than the 'fell sweep' of the Edinburgh Review on the degenerate denizens of Grub Street and Fleet Street. It carried ruin and devastation wherever it went, and in most cases it carried those severe but providential dispensations to the right places, and made havoc consistent both with political and poetic justice. Modern reviewers were found not to be of the old school of critics. They were not concerned with the humble task of chronicling the appearance of a book, but they were quick to condemn, or heap weak weight for the edification of lazy heads; but when they deigned to read and analyze the work they judged, they sought rather for opporunties to display their own wit and knowledge than to flatter the vanity of the author, or to increase his readers. Many of their most splendid articles were essays rather than reviews. The writer, whose work afforded the subject of the article, was commonly dispensed with in favour of a glance at the book itself, accompanied by a few lines of doggerel, or a few panegyric, and the remainder of the article hardly recognized its existence. It is to these purely literary tribulations, written by men of no real merit, that the Review owes most of its reputation.

The North American Review remarks:

"We have intimated our high opinion of the value of the essays and disquisitions with which British Periodical literature is now so copiously filled. An eminent publishing house in Philadelphia has very wisely undertaken to reprint these, and to give them a general circulation in the United States.

There probably never was a series of articles communicated to a periodical, which can challenge comparison with those of Macaulay, for artistic merit. They are characterized by the qualities of complete heart and mind which al\|

He delights every one—high or low, intelligent or ignorant. His style is so keen a flavour that it tickles the coziest palate. He has the unhesitating suffrages of men of taste, and the plaudits of the million. The man who has a common knowledge of the English language, and the scholar who has mastered its refinements, seem equally sensible to the charm of his diction. No matter how unpretending the subject on which he writes may appear to the common eye, in his hands it is made pleasing. We have spent a whole day in the society of his mighty spirit, and felt no sensation of weariness; we read till midnight, and reluctantly laid the volumes aside in obedience to our gained and heavy eyelids. We were ill, but illness could not keep us away from the Magician; for on the following morning we were up with the—no, not the lark, but the night-mare, and again intent upon those treasures of instruction and delight. We can master your ordinary two volume American novel in three hours, by a stop-watch; but here we have only got through with these Miscellanea after three days' constant reading! PATRICK, LOTHW AND WHITBY'S

In the previous editions of this work, the Annotations were not published in the Text, thus requiring a separate book of reference for the study; in this edition the text is placed at the head of each page, thus adapting it for general use without reference to a separate work. The work is well printed from new type on good paper, and is in every respect equal if not superior to the English and French Edition. It will be completed in sixty numbers, at twenty-five cents each.

To those who may be unacquainted with the excellencies of this Commentary and Paraphrase, it may be necessary to state that

BISHOP PATRICK, whose commentary includes from Genesis to the Song of Solomon, is esteemed among theological writers, one of the most acute and sensib[le], and therefore useful Illustrators of the Old Testament. "In his Exposition," says Dr. Wotton, in his Thoughts concerning the Holy Scriptures, "he has exerted, and is esteemed, the most eminent powers of his mind in interpreting the Sacred Writings."

His success in this, and the ample advantage which the public have derived from it, are remarkable, and sufficiently apprised the interpreter, and there is not a great appearance of criticism, but the original texts and all critical aids are closely studied. Dr. Whitby's Commentary on Genesis was pronounced Lowth's to be the best commentary on the Prophecy in the English language.

AND IN THE APOCRYPHA.—The Apocryphal Books of the Old Testament, though not a part of the inspired writings, contain much historical information, and are useful for illustrating the idioms of the New Testament. Arnold's is a Critical Commentary on such books of the Apocrypha as are permitted to be read in the Church. The work was originally published at different times, and is deservedly held in high estimation. Archbishop Cranmer, in the Preface to his Bible, says, "that men may read them (the Books of the Apocrypha) to the edifying of the people, but not to conform and strengthen the doctrines of the church." Dr. Whitby on the Gospels and Epistles.—The Commentary on the New Testament is by Dr. Whitby, who, in the course of his work, exhibits labour and taste worthy of the subject. Few men have brought a larger portion of acumen, and a larger measure of appropriate learning, on the interpretation of Scripture. His knowledge of the Bible itself was thorough and complete, and his acquaintance with the writings of the fathers and of modern interpreters was profound. On a difficult text or expression, the reader will seldom consult him in vain. Dr. Adam's learned Preface to his Commentary on the New Testament says, "The best comment on the New Testament, taken in all respects, is certainly that of Dr. Lowth. He has done all that should be done; he is learned, argumentative, and thoroughly orthodox.

LOWTH ON THE REVELATION.—Bishop Tomline includes this work in his List of Books for Clergymen and Biblical Students. Dr. Doddridge has said of it, that it is "the most complete and valuable Commentary on the Book of the Apocalypse that ever appeared in this or in any other tongue, and that is the most useful and complete Atlas that has ever appeared in this, or in fact in any, country.

Mr. Tanner, in his Preparations of a Traveller, says as a Geographer is so well established, that it is unnecessary to say anything in his praise; but the publishers cannot refrain from stating, that in this, his latest work, he has produced one that reflects on him the highest honour.

Johnson, adapted to the United States by Governor Emerson—a work with which, on examination, I am so well impressed as to consider it entitled to an easily accessible place in the library of every enlightened agriculturist. In that work it is stated that an acre of cranberries, in full bearing, will produce 200 bushels, and the price is seldom less than $1.50 per bushel, and sometimes double that."—Extract from an address delivered by J.
